Rajadharmanuçasana ("the teaching of the duties of kings"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 351 (i.e. Rājadharmānucāsanaparvan).

[Rājadharmānuçāsanaparvan(°va)] ("the section containing the teaching of the duties of kings," the 88th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Rajadharmanucasana). § 621: After the completion of the water rites by the Pandavas, etc. (a), many Brahmarshis, etc. (b), came to Yudhishthira. Narada congratulated Yudhishthira upon his success. Yudhishthira lamented the loss of his kinsmen (a): Yudhishthira at the match of dice had wondered seeing that Karna's feet resembled the feet of Kunti; he inquired of Narada, why the earth had swallowed up the wheels of Karna's chariot (XII, 1). Narada recited to Yudhishthira the story of Karna's pupilage with Drona and Rama (among G., Ra, Y., and D.) and the curse called down upon him by a brahman whose cow Karna had inadvertently slain (δ) (XII, 2); then the story of Karna's extraordinary powers of endurance, in consequence of which his real caste became known to Rama (who had taught him the Brahma weapon), who thereupon cursed him for his deceit; the worm Alarka was an Asura named Damça, who in the Krta age had ravished the spouse of Bhrgu and been cursed by him, until he should be liberated by Paracu-Rama. Karna, arriving before Duryodhana, told him: "I have mastered every weapon" (XII, 3). Narada said: "To a self-choice at Rajapura, the capital of the Külinga king Citrungada Duryodhana (with Karna), Cicupala, etc. (e), repaired; the maiden (who was accompanied by her nurse and a guard of eunuchs) passed by Duryodhana, who then (relying upon Bhishma and Drona) took her up on his chariot and abducted her by force. Karna, riding on his chariot, proceeded in Duryodhana's rear. The kings pursued Karna and Duryodhana; but Karna made them all turn away, and Duryodhana reached Mastinapura with the maiden" (XII, 4). Narada said: "The Magadha king Jarasandha challenged Karna to a single combat; at last they fought with bare arms, and Karna was about to sever the two portions of Jarasandha's body that had been united together by Jara; then Jarasandha gave up all desire of hostility and gave unto Karna the town Malini (i.e. Campa). From that time he ruled over Campā and the Angas agreeably to the wishes of Duryodhana." Allusions to XII, 2, 3, etc. (ζ) (XII, δ). D.-r. Narada became silent; Yudhishthira grieved; Kunti comforted Yudhishthira by telling him that neither she nor Surya could dissuade Karna from fighting the Pandavas (XII, 6). Yudhishthira's lament (1) before Arjuna; he wished to renounce the sovereignty (XII, 7). Arjuna addressed Yudhishthira, justifying war and approving of the acquisition of wealth, quoting Nahusha (who cried fie on the state of poverty, in which he had done many wicked acts, and which is for recluses and R.), and citing the conduct of the gods and Da., which is sanctioned by the Vedas; "this earth formerly belonged to king Dilipa, etc.  $(\dot{\theta})$ ; she now belongs to thee; a great sacrifice awaits thee; if thou dost not perform this sacrifice, the sins of this kingdom shall all be thine; those subjects whose king performs a horse-sacrifice . . . all become pure," as shown by the example of Mahadeva (Civa (b)); "this is the great path called Daçaratha (affording place for ten waggons, i.e. the sacrifice [Nil.]) " (XII, 8). Unmoved by Arjuna's words, Yudhishthira desired to lead the life of a religious recluse (XII, 9). Bhima's address to Yudhishthira commending sovereignty (XII, 10).- 622: Arjuna recited the story of the discourse between Cakra (in the shape of a golden bird) and certain vouths (R.) desirous of leading a forest life (XII. 11). -§ 623: Nakula addressed Yudhishthira, blaming renunciation and commending the life of a householder (XII, 12). Sahadeva recommended to Yudhishthira a life of action with the soul free from attachments (XII, 13). Draupadi reminded Yudhishthira of his former counsels (a) (XII, 14). Arjuna praised him who wields the rod of chastisement; "Indra, by the slaughter of Vrtra, became the great Indra; those among the gods that are given to slaughtering others are adored much more by men; Rudra, etc. (3) are all slaughterers; all people bend to these gods, but not to Brahman or Dhatr or Pushan at any time, except a few men of noble disposition" (XII, 15). Bhīma's second address to Yudhishthira(y), urging him to subdue his grief (XII, 16). Yudhishthira exposed the folly of earthly enjoyments quoting Janaka (observent of the religion of moksha): "my treasures are immense; yet I possess nothing; if again the whole of Mithila were burnt. nothing of mine will be burnt" (XII, 17).-§ 624: Arjuna recited the story of the discourse between the Videha king Janaka (who had shaved his head) and his queen (the princess of Koçala), in which the latter explained the claims of a life of poverty and renunciation (XII, 18).- § 625: Yudhishthira's reply to Arjuna on the vanity of wealth (XII, 19). -§ 626: Devasthana pointed out to Yudhishthira that the period had not come when he could retire into the woods (a)(XII, 20), and recommended the assumption of sovereignty with his soul freed from attachment, quoting a discourse which Brhaspati delivered to Indra; the R., etc., adopt the religion of Exertion (not Emancipation), and attain to heaven through their acts (XII, 21).- § 627: Arjuna justified before Yudhishifting the slaughter of foes in battle: "Indra, himself, though a brahman, became a kshatriya in his acts, and battled with his sinful kinsfolk 810 times" (XII, 22).-§ 628: Vyāsa dissuaded Yudhishthira from a life of retirement and commended a life of domesticity, quoting a verse of Brhaspati ("like a snake devouring mice, the Earth devours a king that is inclined to peace and a brahman that is exceedingly attached to domesticity"), and reciting the story of R.-r. Sudyumna: the brothers Cankha and Likhita dwelled in two separate dwellings on the banks of Bahuda; once, when Cankha had gone out, Likhita came to his asylum and ate many ripe fruits. Cankha told him to confess to the king and ask him to inflict on him the punishment of a thief. King Sudyumna would pardon him; but Likhita would not; Sudyumna then caused his hands to be cut off; Likhita, having asked pardon of Cankha, was told by him to gratify D., R., and P. at Bahuda, upon which two hands grew out. Cankha said that he was not his chastiser, "but the king has been himself purified, as also thyself, along with P." That king became eminent by this act and obtained the highest success (XII, 23). Vyāsa exhorted Yudhishthira to grant the wishes of his brothers, perform sacrifices, and imitate the great monarchs of old, especially Hayagriva (b) (XII, 24).- § 529: Hearing the words of Vydea and seeing Arjuna angry, Yudhishthira declared to Vyāsa that earthly rule could give him no delight. Vydsa answered, pointing out the virtues of Time, quoting "the old story recited by king Senapit in grief". "Engaging in battle has been said to be the sacrifice for a king; a due observance of the science of chastisement is his yoga; and the gift of wealth in sacrifices in the shape of dakshind is his renunciation; all this should be regarded as acts that sanctify him " (XII, 25) .- § 630: Yudhishthira's reply to Arjuna recommending a life of yoga and austerities;

this is the practice of R., regarded by D. as brahmans; this is the opinion of the Vaikhanasas: the Ajah, etc. (a) have all gone to heaven by means of Vedic study; by performing the acts indicated in the Vedas, battle, sacrifices, study of the Vedas, restrainment of passion, one goes to heaven by the southern path of the Sun; the northern path is travelled by those devoted to yoga, and is much applauded by those conversant with the Puranas; "one acquires heaven through contentment," citing the discourse of Yayati of old (XII, 26). Yudhishthira consured himself for his cupidity and for the slaughter he caused of his kinsmen  $(\beta)$ ; Bhishma had, by the energy of his weapons, burnt Ugrayudha, etc.; Vydsa comforted Yudhishthirs by explaining the action of Destiny. and exhorted him to work (XII, 27).—§ 631: Vyūsa recited "the old story, that is known by the name of Açman's discourse": the Videha king Janaka, filled with sorrow, questioned the wise brahman Açman as to how a man should behave upon occasions of the accession and the destruction of both kinsmen and wealth. Acman said that Destiny and Time are inevitable; "no person can see either heaven or hell; the scriptures, however, are the eyes of the virtuous; frame thy conduct according to the scriptures." Janaka became freed from grief; "enjoy the earth, O son of -Kunti!" (XII, 28) - § 632: Arjuna asked Krshna (who from his earliest years was dearer to Yudhishthira than even Arjuna himself) to dispel Yudhishthira's grief. Krehna asked Yudhiahthira not to grieve for men who died heroically in battle in the observance of kshatriya duties, quoting the Shodaçarājopākhyāna (b), i.e. the old discourse of Nārada before Srājaya when the latter was deeply afflicted with grief on account of the death of his son. Srnjaya was freed from grief, and Narada gave back to him his son Surarnashthivin, whom Pareate had given him, and who had been bereft of life; that child should live 1,000 years (XII, 29) .- § 633 : Requested by Yudhishthira, Krshna told Narada-Parratopakhyana (b) (XII, 30).- § 634: Thereafter Narada told Suvarnasthivisambhavopākhyāna (b) (XII, 31).—§ 635: Vyāsa exhorted Yudhishchira to shake off his grief and assume the reins of sovereignty. Yudhishthira feared that the guilt of slaughter had stained him; Vyāsa repeated his observations on Destiny (XII, 32); as Yudhishthira still was remorseful (a), Vyāsa repeated his observations on Time, and pointed to expiatory rites, illustrating the case by the war of 32,000 years, by which the gods, having slain Dai., gained possession of heaven, and slew 88,000 bruhmans called Calarrkah who had joined the Da.; "thou hast only followed the path formerly trodden by the very gods; men like you never go to hell." He recommended a horse-sacrifice as an expitation, mentioning that Indra, assisted by the Maruts, gradually performed 100 sacrifices and became Catakratu, and is adored in the heavens by Aps., R., and D. (XII, 33). Vyāsa discoursed on expiation and indicated the acts for which there should be expiation, citing the sage Uddalaka, who caused his son Cretaketu to be begotten by a disciple, etc. (XII, 34), and declared that by penances, religious rites, and gifts one may wash off sins if one does not commit them anew, and indicated diverse kinds of expiation for diverse kinds of sins (XII, 35). Asked by Yudhishthira, Vyāsa declared what food is clean and what is unclean (XII, 36). Yudhishthira desired to hear of the duties of kings and of the four different orders. Vydea, casting his eyes on Narada, directed Yudhishthira to apply to Bhishma for discourses on kingly duties, as Bhishma, having gratified D.-r. with Brh. at their head, had acquired a knowledge of the duties of kings, and of that science, with its interpretations, that Ucanas and Brhaspati know : and a knowledge of all the Vedas with their branches, from Vasishtha and Cyavana of Bhrgu's race; in olden days he studied under Sanathumara (the eldest-born son of Brahman); he learned the duties of the Yatis from Markandeya; and obtained all weapons from Rama and Indra; although childless, yet he has many regions of bliss before himself; B.-r. were always his courtiers. Yudhishthira was ashamed to approach Bhishma. Krehna exhorted Yudhishthira to rise up, shaking off his grief ( $\beta$ ). Thus addressed by Krshna, etc. ( $\gamma$ ), Yudhishthira gave up his grief and anxiety, and with his brothers and the other kings, headed by Dhrtarashtra, set out for Hustinapura. The procession described (8) (XII, 37). The citizens welcomed Yudhishthira and Draupadi, etc. (a). Yudhishthira entered the palace with Dhaumya and Dhrtarashtra, and was blessed by the brahmans, but cursed by Carvaka, a Ra. who had disguised himself as a brahman, and a friend of Duryodhana; the brahmans killed Carvaka by uttering the mere sound hum (XII, 38).- § 636: Krshna related: In the Krta age Rå. Carvaka performed penances in Badari; at last he solicited from Brahmán the boon of immunity from fear at the hands of every being in the universe, which Brahmán granted him, only with the limitation that he should be careful not to offend brahmans. Then he began to cause trouble to the gods; Brahmán predicted Carvaka's friendship with Duryodhana, and that he would insult the brahmans (XII, 39). - § 637: The ceremony of Yudhishthira's installation on the throne described (a); he made gifts to the brahmans, who all blessed him and his brothers (XII, 40). Yudhishthira answered and enjoined respect for his aged uncle, disposed of the high appointments of state  $(\beta)$  (XII, 41), and caused the obsequial rites (craddha) to be performed in honour of the slaughtered heroes ( $\gamma$ ), and performed acts of kindness to the ladies, widowed in the battle, the destitute, the blind, and helpless (XII, 42). Then he adored Krehna (XII, 43), and assigned to his brothers proper residences from among the palaces of the Kuru princes slain in battle (8). They passed a happy night in their respective abodes, and in the morning presented themselves before king Yudhishthira (XII, 44). Yudhishthira's gifts to diverse persons (e). Then he addressed Krehna (with the Kaustubha), whom he found rapt in meditation (XII, 45); he uttered a hymn to Krehna, who awoke and praised Bhiehma (1), asking Yudhishthira to resort to Bhishma for instruction. Yudhishthira requested Krehna to grant Bhishma the sight of his divine person. Krshna caused Satyaki to let Daruka yoke his chariot with Sugriva and Çaibya, etc. (XII, 46). Description of the bed of arrows on which Bhishma lay, surrounded by R. Vydea, etc. (n). Bhishma hymned Krehna ( $\theta$ ). Krehna moved by Bhishma's adorations, bestowed upon him heavenly knowledge compassing the Past, the Present, and the Future, and went away. Those holy brahmans adored Bhishma and Krshna. Seeing the devotion of Bhishma, Krshna auddenly rose from his seat and ascended his chariot with Sātyaki; Yudhishthira and Arjuna mounted another; Bhimasena and the twins a third; Kipa, Yuyuteu, and Sanjaya on their respective chariots (XII, 47).- 638: Then Krehna, etc. (a), proceeded to Kurukshetra (description). Krshna pointed out to Yudhishthira the five lakes of Rama Bhargava. Requested by Yudhishthira (XII, 48), Krehna related: Ramopakhyans (b). Then he proceeded quietly in his chariot (XII, 49).- § 639: Yudhishthira's eulogy of Rama(a).

Beholding from a distance the spot on which Bhishma lay (on the banks of the river Oghavati), Yudhishthira, etc. (3), descended from their chariots and approached and saluted the R. (headed by Vydsa). Seeing Bhishma on the point of death,  $K_{l}$  shas addressed him kindly ( $\gamma$ ), and eulogized him ("competent to subjugate D., G., As., Y., and Ra.; spoken of by brahmans as the ninth of the Vasus; knowing the knowledge of the caturhotra - v. BR. - and the Sankhya and Yoga, etc., the Vedas and the Puranas") (XII, 50). Bhishma saluted  $K_{rehma}$  (3), and beheld his eternal form. Krehna said that it was owing to Bhishma's devotion that he had displayed his celestial form to him; "those regions, O king! are ready for thee whence there is no return; fifty-six days still remain for thee to live; when Surya turns to his northerly course, you shall go there; D. and V., riding on their chariots, are waiting for thee invisibly." Krohna asked Bhishma to instruct Yudhishthira, etc.; "when thou wilt leave this world for that, all knowledge will expire with thee" (XII, 51). Bhishma alleged physical weakness and mental darkness as reasons for his inability to obey Krahna, and he also hesitated to speak in Krshna's presence. Krshna removed Bhishma's pain and granted him power to recollect everything and behold the universe like a fish in a limpid stream. M.-r. with Vyasa adored Krshna with words, accompanied by Re, Yojus, and Saman verses; colestial flowers fell, and Aps. sang, etc. At sunset the M.-r., rising up, saluted Krehna, Bhishma, and Yudhishthira. Upon this, Krshna (etc.) (e), returned to Hastinapura, after having saluted Bhishma, saying that they would return next day (description) (XII, 52). Krahna passed the night happily, performed his morning rites, and was welcomed with music and song at early dawn; asked by Krehna, Satyaki saw Yudhishthira and apprised him of Krshna's readiness to accompany him into the presence of Bhishma. Yudhishthira asked Arjuna to see that his chariot was made ready; then he, with the twins, etc. (ζ), proceeded to Krshna's abode. Krshna, accompanied by Sūtyaki, mounted his chariot, yoked with Balūhaka, etc.  $(\eta)$ , urged by  $D\bar{a}ruka$ . The princes set out. Arrived near Bhishma (surrounded by M.-r.), Krehna, etc. (0), alighting from their chariots, saluted R. by raising their right hands. Yudhishthira approached Bhishma, eying him timidly (XII, 53).—§ 640: Many R. and Sa., etc. (a), came to Bhishma. Narada urged the Pandavas to take advantage of the short span of life still left to Bhishma for soliciting him to discourse on morality. Yudhishthira requested Krshna to put questions to Bhīshma. Bhīshma's chcerful answer. He enquired of Krehna why he was desired to discourse on morality and the duties of kings, Krshua's divine self being best fitted to do so; Krshna explained that his motive was only the enhancement of Bhishma's glory; "thou hast always worshipped R. and D." (XII, 54). Bhishma consented to discourse on morality and duty, and desired Yudhishthira to question him. Krshua introduced Yudhirhita to Bhishma, who comforted Yudhishthira, saying that what he had done he had done in observance of kshatriya duties. Yudhishthira humbly approached Bhishma and touched his feet; Bhishma, kissing his head, asked him to take a seat and question him without anxiety (XII, 55). Yudhishthira solicited Bhishma to discourse on kingly duties which are regarded as the root of all other duties in the world. Bhishma, howing to Dharma, Krehna (who is Brahman in full), and the brahmans, set forth the general duties of kings ("as regards R. also, truth is their great wealth "); he quoted two glokas of Manu: "fire has spring from water, the kshatriya from the brahman, and iron from stone; these three can exert their force on every other thing; but on their origins (yonishu), it is extinguished (campati)"; and two clokas of M.-r. Ucanas (a brahman who rushes to battle may be chastised by a kshatriya); and a cloka of Brhaspati (according to B.) (a king should not always be mild, nor always flerce) (X11, 56). Continuation of Bhishma's discourse, enjoining readiness for action on kings; quoting a cloka sung by Uçanas ("like a snake swallowing up mice"; cf. ch. 23); and one by king Marutta, agreeably to Brhaspati's opinion; Bahu's son, king Sagara, who exiled his eldest son Asamanjas, who used to drown the children of the citizens in the Sarayū; R. Uddālaka who cast off his favourite son ('vetaketu, because the lutter used to invite brahmans with deceptive promises of entertainment. The king should administer justice like Yama and amass wealth like Kubera. He quoted a verse sung in days of old by Bhargava [i.e. Valmiki (cf. Hopkins, p. 61)], in the narrative called Ramacarita, on king[ly duties] ("one should first select a king; then should he select a wife, and then earn wealth; if there be no king, what would become of his wife and acquisitions?" (XII, 57). Continuation of Bhishma's discourse, inculcating that protection is the very essence of kingly duties, quoting Brhaspati, etc. (3), and verses sung by Brhaspati ("by exertion the ampta was obtained, by exertion the Asuras were slain," etc.). Vyasa, etc. (7), expressed their delight with the discourse. R. and the princes left Bhishma for the night and ascended their chariots; then they bathed in the Drshadvati, offered oblations of water to their ancestors, etc., and entered Hastinapura (XII, 58).- § 641: The next morning the Pandavas and the Iddavas set out to Kurukshetra, approached Bhishma and saluted the R.; Yudhishthira enquired about the origin of the word rajan ("king"). Bhishma's unswer: In the Krta age sovereignty first began; the population of the earth. became sinful; the Vedas, etc., were lost; D. applied to Brahmán, who composed a treatise of 100,000 lessons, on virtue, profit, and pleasure, and emancipation, etc. (description). Brahman, addressing the gods, said that his work, aided by Chastisement (Dandaniti), would protect the world. Circ studied the great work and abridged it (then called Vaiçālāksha, in 10,000 lessons) for indra, who abridged it further to 5,000 lessons, and called it Bahudantaka; Brhaspati further abridged it to 3,000 lessons, and called it Barhaspatys; Karya [i.e. Uçanas] (the preceptor of yoga) further abridged it to 1,000 lessons. Thus, in view of the period of men's lives and [the general] decrease, that science (castra) was abridged by M.-r. Asked by the gods, who deserved to have superiority among men, Vishau created by his will a son, Virajus; but he inclined to renunciation; and so did Virajus' son Kirtimat and the latter's son Kardama. Kardama's son Ananga became a protector of creatures, fully conversant with the science of chastisement.

Then follows the history of Prthu Vainya (f). Thus the tales of all past events (agamaç ca Purāṇānāṃ), the origin of M.-r., etc. (e) were all treated of in this treatise of Brahman (Paitāmahs çāstrs) (XII, 59). Requested by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on the general duties of the four orders and the special duties of each of the orders. Sacrifice has been laid down for the cadra also, but without svaha and vashatkara or any other mantra; he should perform pakayajñas, where the dakshina is purnapatra (v. the note of PCR., p. 195); in days of old a cadra of the name of Paijavana gave a dakshina of 100,000 purnapatras according to the ordinance called Aindragnya (B. Aindragna). Devotion cleanses all sacrifices. The members of the three other classes have all sprung from the brahmans; the brahmans are the gods of the very gods. The cadra, who is without Re, Vajus, and Saman, has Prajapati for his god, and devotion for his sacrifice. A verse sung in praise of sacrifice by the Vaikhanasa munis. The homas called skanna and askanna (XII, 60). The four modes of life specified (ζ). M.-r. cite a verse sung by Narayana (XII, 61). The four stages of life have been laid down for the brahman; the other three orders do not adopt them. What duties are improper for a brahman (XII, 62). Continuation. The duties in the four stages of life stated more specifically. A kehatriya, for leading the life of R., may adopt the bhikshu mode of life; [but] a life of mondicancy is not obligatory upon the three orders (XII, 63). The nature of kingly duties. "It has been told to you how, in days of old, many kings repaired to Vishnu (Narayana) for the sake of the science of chastisement. S., etc.  $(\eta)$  are all observant of kehatriya duties. In days of old when Da. had multiplied, Mandhatr became king and performed a great sacrifice from desire of beholding Narayana (Vishnu), who, in the form of Indra, had a discourse with him touching Vishnu, extolling the kshatriya duties above all other duties, and citing the example of Vishnu himself, who for the sake of D. and R. and Brahman and the brahmans, slew all his foes among the As. (XII, 64). Indra extolled the kshatriya duties. Asked by Mandhatr, he set forth the duties of the Yavanas, etc. ( $\theta$ ). Then Nardyana (in the form of Indra), accompanied by M., repaired to his eternal abode (XII, 66). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed in detail on the four stages of life (XII, 66). What should be the characteristics of kingdoms. In days of old, in consequence of anarchy, men met with destruction; they made certain compacts, but soon repaired to Brahman to get a king; Manu was prevailed upon to accept the kingdom, against getting one-fiftieth of their animals, one-tenth of their grain, one-quarter of their merit, etc. Manu then made his round through the world, checking everywhere all acts of wickedness. Men desiring happiness must choose a king (XII, 67). Why the king is regarded as a god on earth. Bhishma recited the discourse between Brhaspati (the son of Angiras) and Vasumanas (king of Koçala); Brhaspati described the evils of anarchy; the king becomes Agni, etc. (1). Vasumanas thenceforth began to protect his subjects (XII, 68). The special duties of a king; the duties of a king in case of an invasion by a stronger monarch, quoting Brhaspati (v. 2619) and two verses (v. 2667-8) sung by Angiras (i.e. Brhaspati). The blessedness of chastisement; the king causes the Krta age, etc. (x), to set in (XII, 69). The thirty-six virtues that a king should possess. Hearing the words of Bhishma, king Yudhishthira, protected by Bhima, etc., worshipped Bhishma, and from that time began to rule according to his teaching (XII, 70). Asked by Yudhishthira. Bhishma explained the way in which the king should discharge the duty of protection (XII, 71). The qualifications of the king's priest: Bhishma recited the old story about the discourse between Aila's son Pururavas and Mataricvan, explaining the order of birth of the four classes (from Brahmán's moutin, arms, thighs, and feet, respectively) and their duties, the right of dominion appertaining to the brahman; therefore a king should appoint a priest; D., men, P., G., Us., and Ra. all depend upon sacrifices for their support, and sacrifices depend upon the king, who is Indra, Yama, and Dharma (XII, 72). The effects of a disunion between brahmans and kshatriyas: the old story about the discourse of Aila's son and Kacyapa; the brahman and the kshatriva are said to be the progenitors of all men; in consequence of the sins perpetrated by sinful men, the god Rudra appears in the kingdom. Asked by Aila, Kaçyapa explained who Rudra is and what his acts are (Rudra exists in the hearts of men; his shape is like that of the wind-gods). Then follows a discussion of the following question: "If chastisement touches the wicked and the good equally, why should the good yet abstain from acts of wickedness" (XII, 73). The preservation and growth of the king rest upon the king's priest: Mucukundopākhyāna (g), the old narrative about the discourse between king Mucukunda and king Vaigravana (the lord of Alaka, Kubera) (XII, 74). The conduct by which a king aggrandises his subjects and wins regions of felicity hereafter. Yudhishthira did not see any merit in sovereignty and wished to retire into the woods. Bhishma urged Yudhishthira to put forth manliness and exertion (XII, 75). The difference between brahmane engaged in their own duties and those amongst them that are not so engaged (XII, 76). The king is the lord of all wealth except what belongs to the brahmans. The old narrative of the speech made by the Kaikeya king unto a Ra., who was about to abduct him, but at last left him (XII, 77). Whether a brahman, in seasons of distress, can practise, as a means of livelihood, the duties of a vaiçya; what articles, in this case, he may sell; how the king should behave when he is opposed by all the orders of men; if kshatriyas become hostile to brahmans, how the latter should be protected; Yudhishthira inquired whether, upon an anarchy happening, any man that protects and rules acquires merit; Bhīshma answered in the affirmative; a king that does not or cannot protect is useless (XII, 78). The kind of persons that are eligible as royal priests; the limits or measure of the dakshina (XII, 79). Who should and who should not be trusted by the king (XII, 80). How the king should conduct himself for winning over kinsmen and friends: the old story of a discourse between Krehna and Narada: Krehna said: "My heart is worried through the cruel speeches of my kinsmen; might resides in Sankarehana, mildness in Gada; and as regards Pradyumna, he surpasses even myself in beauty of person; [but] many others of the Andhakas and the Trehnis are possessed of great prosperity and might. What can be more painful than [my relation to] Ahuka and Akrara (v. the note of PCR., p. 260)?" Narada said that the calamity was due to Krshna himself; "the kingdom cannot be taken back from Babhru and Ugrasena, employ soft words, etc.; the Yadaras, etc. (λ) are dependent on thee; R. always pray for thy advancement; thou art the lord of all creatures, etc." (XII, 81). The second means by which a king may win kinsmen and friends; an old story is cited of what the sage (brahmarshi) Kalakarrkshiya had said to the Koçala king Kehemadarçin; Kālakavrkehīya travelled through the country with a crow in a cage and observed the misdeeds of all the officers of the king, saying that it was the crow that told him all this, and related it to the king; the crow then was found pierced with a shaft within the cage; he quoted Yama as to the painful lot of those that serve the king; "this thy kingdom is like the river Sta, boats sink in it; thy father regarded me lovingly as his friend; when distress overtook this kingdom during the reign of thy father I performed many penances." Kehemadarcin then took a minister from the kehatriya order, and appointed Kālakavrkehīya as his purchita, and subjugated the whole earth (XII, 82). The qualifications of legislators, ministers, courtiers, and counsellors (XII, 83). The merits of agreeableness of speech; the old account of a conversation between Brhaspati and Cakra (i.e. Indra) (XII, 84). Which are the affairs of state that a king has to deal with, and by which persons ought they to be executed? (XII, 85). The kind of city which a king should have (XII, 86). How a kingdom should be consolidated and how it should be protected (XII, 87). How a king should behave if he wishes for wealth (XII, 88). A king should not cut down trees yielding edible fruits. How one man acquires superiority over the rest; the gifts made by thee in this world support D., P., men, N., Ra., birds, and animals (XII, 89). The duties of kings (kshatradharman) explained by Angiras Utathya to Mandhatr Yauranacra, about the king's power being only a trust for the good of his people and not for the gratification of his own caprices; the R. made the king, intending that he should be the embodiment of righteousness on earth; he is called rajan ("king") in whom rightcourness shines (rajeta); he in whom there is no righteousness is called a vrshala (yasmin vilīyats dharmah(=vrshah)); dharma("righteousness") comes (sravati) from dhana ("wealth") or from dharana ("restraining"); Svayambhū (Brahman) created Dharma for the advancement and growth of creatures; in consequence of his malice towards the brahmans Cri deserted Bali Vairocana and repaired to Indra, and Bali indulged in many vain regrets. The crutis declare that Unrighteousness (Adharma) begat a son named Pride (Darpa) upon Cri; Pride led many D. and As. to ruin, and many R.-r.; when the king does not restrain vice, sinful Ra., and persons of neutral sex. etc., begin to take birth even in respectable families, etc. (XII, 90). Continuation of Utathya's discourse. "The ages Krta, etc. ( $\mu$ ), are all dependent on the conduct of the king. It is said that the Creator (Dhatr) created power for the object of protecting the weak; weakness is indeed a great being, for everything depends upon it. The king is Yama himself. This is the way in which Indra, etc.  $(\nu)$ have acted. D., R., P., and G. sing the praises, both here and hereafter, of that king whose conduct is righteous." Thus addressed by Utathya, Mandhatr did as he was directed. and became the sole lord of the wide carth (XII, 91). How a righteous king desirous of acting rightcously should behave: the old story of what M.-r. Vamadeva sang in ancient times to king Vasumanas (XII, 92); the consequences that result from the king's acting unrighteously. "Yayati Nahusha, thus having propounded the king's lore (rajopanishadam), said that a king should slay even contemptible foes" (XII, 93). Continuation of Vamadera's discourse. Thus addressed by Vamadeva, king Vasumanas did as he was directed (XII, 94). How a kehatriya should act who desires to subjugate another (XII, 95). A king should never desire to subjugate the earth by unrighteous means. It was by such behaviour that Indra got the sovereignty of the world. King Pratardana, subjugating his foes in great battle, took all their wealth, including their very grain and medicinal herbs, but left their land untouched. King Divodaea, after subjugating his foes, brought away the very remnants of their sacrificial fires, their clarified butter, and their food; for this reason he was deprived of the merit of his conquest. King Nabhaga gave away whole kingdoms with their rulers as sacrificial presents to the brahmans, excepting the wealth of learned brahmans and ascetics (XII, 96). Yudhishthire's condemnation of kehatriya practices. Bhishma pointed out that by chastening the wicked, protecting the good, performing sacrifices, etc., a king cleaners himself, and ultimately obtains a residence in Indra's heaven (XII, 97). The regions of felicity acquired by heroes killed in battle: the old story of the discourse between Ambartsha and Indra. Ambarisha, the son of Nabhaga, having repaired to heaven, beheld his own generalissimo Sudeva in the company of Indra, and going to regions still higher. Indra explained to Ambarisha the sacrifice of battle. "That warrior who, having slain the commander of the hostile army, mounts the vehicle of his fallen antagonist, comes to be regarded as possessed of the powers of Vishau and the intelligence of Brhaspati . . . thousands of Aps. covet him for their lord; having slain Jambha, etc. (F), I myself have become the chief of the celestials" (XII, 98). The old story of the battle between Pratardana and king Janaka, who cheered his troops by showing them both heaven (full of G.-girls, etc.) and hell; his warriors vanquished their fees in battle (XII, 99). How kings should lead their troops to battle. "It is proper to set the troops in motion on Caitri or Margacirshi. Keeping Saptarshayah (Ursa major) behind them, the troops should fight; the wind, the sun, and Cukra (Venus) should blow and shine from behind them; the wind is superior to the sun, the sun to Cukra. When a small number of troops is to fight with a great many, the array called Sacimukha should be formed "(XII, 100) How the troops should be accoutred, armed, and disposed for battle. The Gandharas, etc. (a), fight best with their curved knives (nakhara) and lances. The Uçinaras are possessed of great strength and skilled in all kinds of weapons. The Pracyas are skilled in fighting from the backs of elephants and conversant with stratagems (kūtayodhinah). The Yavanas, etc.  $(\pi)$ , are well skilled in fighting with bare arms. The Dakshinatyas are skilled in fighting sword in hand. Indications of courage (XII, 101). What the indications are of the future success of an army. "Cambara has said that having afflicted a foe first, forgiveness should be shown afterwards" (XII, 102). How a king should behave towards a fee that is mild, towards one that is fierce, and towards one that has many allies: the old narrative of the discourse between Brhaspati und Indra; Brhaspati recommended conciliation or lulling a foe into security; other means; a king should never slay a large number of the defeated troops, etc.; the indications of wicked persons. Indra, in subduing his foes, acted strictly according to the words of Brhaspati, and reduced all his enemies to subjection (XII, 103). How a righteous king deprived of his kingdom should act; the discourse between Kehemadarçin and Kalakavrkehiya indays of old, when prince (nrpasutah) Kehemadarçin had become weak and fallen into great distress; "only a fool, deprived of former prosperity, censures the Supreme Ordainer (Dhalr)" (XII, 104). Continuation of the discourse; "do thou serve the Mithila king Janaka . . .; cause thy enemy to perform the great sacrifice called vicrajit and divest him by that means of all his possessions, and cause an ascetic conversant with uoon to make thy for desire to adopt renunciation" (XII, 105). The king's reply discountenancing deceit and fraud. Asked by Kalakarrkshiya, the Videha king Janaka made friends with the Koçala prince Kehemadarçin. took him to Mithila, and bestowed upon him his own daughter, etc. (XII, 106). How the king should behave towards the aristocracy (XII, 107). Important duties in brief; the relative superiority of parents and preceptors (XII, 108). Characteristics of truth and fulsehood; "even a person that is disrespectable . . . may succeed in earning great merit as the hunter Balaka by slaying the blind [beast]"; Kauçika again, on the banks of the Ganga, obtained great merit (sic! cf. PCR., p. 352, and Kaucika ); a decoitful person always wishes to betake himself to the practice of As. (PCR. amonavam dharmam) (XII, 109). How many creatures avoid difficulties? "they that worship with devotion the god Narayana (Krshna), that Supreme Lord of all creatures . . . succoed in overcoming all difficulties. He is always engaged in doing what is agreeable to Arjuna, and also to Yudhishthira." Blessing upon the reader (XII, 110). How may good and wicked men be recognized? the old story of the discourse between a tiger and a jackal: in ancient times, in a rich city called Purika, there was a cruel king Paurika, who was reborn as a jackal; remembering his former prosperity he became filled with grief and abstained from meat, and became compassionate and truthful, etc., and lived upon fruit that had dropped from the trees; he dwelt in a vast crematorium, his birth-place. The other jackals in vain endeavoured to make him eat carrion, promising to give him food. He consented to become the minister of a tiger, on the condition that the latter should always meet with him alone and in secret, etc. The old servants of the king (i.e. the tiger) first in vain tried to bribe him; then they secretly placed the meat intended for the king in the house of the jackal. The king ordered the fackal to be slain. The mother of the king dissuaded him ("the firmament seems to be like the solid base of a vessel, the fire-fly seems to be like the actual spark of fire; in reality, however, the sky has no base, and there is no fire in the fire-fly; there is necessity for secreting"). A righteous agent of the jackal discovered everything about the false accusation. Notwithstanding the entreaties of the king, the jackal retired to the forest, gave up his body by sitting in praya, and proceeded to heaven (XII, 111). A king should not behave after the manner disclosed in the history of a camel: There was, in the Kyta age, a huge camel who had recollection of all the acts of his former life; he practised severe austerities in the forest; Brahmán granted him the boon that he should have a neck so long that he could seize any food at even the end of 100 yojanas. He became idle. One day a great storm arose. The camel placed his head and a portion of his neck within the cave of a mountain; it began to pour in torrents; a jackal with his wife entered the cave for shelter and began to eat of the camel's neck, and thus the camel met with his death because of his idleness. "Manu has said that victory depends upon intelligence" (XII, 112). The old story of the discourse between the Ocean and the Rivers. The Ocean (the refuge of the foes of the gods) asked the Rivers why the latter never washed away a cane; Ganga replied that the reason is that the cane bends (XII, 113). How a man of worth should behave when insulted with harsh words in an assembly (XII, 114). The qualifications of persons that may be employed by the king. "Criminal laws should be duly administered. even after the manuor of Cankha and Likhita" (XII, 115). Bhishma related the story of the dog who by favour of the R. became a carabha and was, for misconduct, retransformed into his own canine form; Bhishma had heard the tale in the hermitage of Rama Jamadagnya, recited by many R.; the dog first was transformed into a leopard, then into a tiger subsisting upon the other animals of the forest (XII, 116); then into an elephant > a lion > a çarabha (having eight legs and eyes on the forehead); one day, eagerly thirsting for blood, he wished to slay the sage, who then retransformed him into a dog (XII, 117); the dog became very cheerless, and was driven by R. from his hermitage. Continuation of Bhishma's discourse on the qualifications of servants (XII, 118). The lessons to be drawn from the story of the dog that was transformed into a carabha (XII, 119). How a king should exercise the duty of protection; "the human body is the residence of Indra, etc. (p)" (XII, 120). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed about the origin and character of chastisement ("the foremost of all beings among D., R., P., Y., Ra., Pc., Sa., As., etc."), quoting Manu and Brahman ("the first word": pragracanam); some of the names of chastisement  $(\sigma)$ ; "beggars, principal judges, astrologers, performers of propitiatory and Atharran rites, treasury, allies, grain, etc., constitute the body, composed of seven attributes and eight limbs, of a kingdom; chastisement is another powerful limb of a kingdom"; it springs from Brahmán (the creator of the universe with D., As., Ra., etc.) and the Voda; several kinds of ryavahāra; Brahmán has laid down: "neither mother nor father, nor brother, nor wife, nor priest, is unpunishable with that king who rules agreeably to his duty" (XII, 121). The discourse between the Anga king Vasuhoma (who was pious and, with his spouse, always practised ponances) and Indra's friend king Mandhatr, at Munjaprshtha (esteemed by P. and D.-r.) on that peak of Himavat (near Meru) (yatra Munjavato Ramo jataharanam adicat: Nil. is silent) a favourite haunt of Rudra, where Vasuhoma came to be regarded as a D.-r. Asked by Mandhatr about the origin of chastisement, Vasukoma (who knew the doctrines of Brhaspati and Uçanas) related: Once Brahmán, desiring to perform a sacrifice, failed to find a priest; he conceived in his brain; after 1,000 years he sneezed; the foetus. Kshupa, fell from his head; he became a lord of creatures and a priest in the sacrifice of Brahman. Chastisement disappeared; a great confusion set in; Brahman repaired to Vishnu (armed with an enormous çula), who created his own self into the form of chastisement (having righteousness for its legs); from that form the goddess Sarasvatī created the Science of Chastisement (dandanīti); after this Vishnu (culavarayudhah) made Indra the ruler of D., Yama Vairarvalu of P., Kubera of treasures and Ra., Meru of the mountains, the Ocean of the rivers, Varuna of the waters and As., Death of life and all living things, Fire of all things possessed of energy, Mahadeva of R., Vasishtha of the brahmans, Jataredas of V., Surya of all luminous bodies, the Moon of Stars and constellations, Amounat of herbs, Skanda (of twelve arms) of spirits and ghostly beings; Time of all creatures and the fourfold death (v. PCR.) and of grief and joy. Upon the completion of that sacrifice, Mahadeva made over chastisement to Vishnu > Angiras > Indra and Marici > Bhygu > all R.> Lp. > Kehupa > Nanu Vajvasvata (grāddhadeva) > his sons. Chastisement remains awake, protecting all creatures, being in the hands of successive holders: Indra > Agni > Varuna > Prajupati > righteousness > the son of Brahman, i.e. Law > energy > the herbs > the mountains > the juices > Nirrti > the planets and the luminous bodies in heaven > the Vedas > the form of Vishnu with equine head > Brahmán > Mahadeva > Viçvedevah > R. > Soma > D. > the brahmans > the kehatriyas. Several names of Mahadeva (7). Blessing upon the reader (XII, 122). Bhishma's discourse on Virtue, Wealth, and Pleasure. The narrative of the discourse in olden times between R. Kamanda[ka] and king Angarichtha (XII. 123). How may one acquire a virtuous behaviour? Bhishma recited the discourse of Dhytarashira to Duryodhana; as the latter was burning with envy at the sight of the prosperity of Yudhishthira and his brothers at Indraprastha and his mistakes in the palace he, accompanied by Karna, went to Dhrtarashtra with the same question; "10,000 snatakas eat at Yudhishthira's palace off plates of gold; his steeds are of the Tittiri and the Kalmāsha breeds (? so PCR.; acvāms tittiri-kalmashan), etc." Dhytarashtra said : "Mandhaty conquered the whole world in only one night, Janamejaya in the course of three, Nabhaga in seven," and he related the story of Indra's taking away from Dai. Prahlada the latter's prosperity; Prahlada in days of yore, by the merit of his behaviour, snatched from Indra his sovereignty and reduced the three worlds to subjection. Indra repaired for knowledge to Brhaspati, who caused him to repair to Bhargava (Uçanas), who said that Prahlada had better knowledge. Indra, in the shape of a brahman, repaired to Prahlada, who said that he was ever obedient to the teachings of Cukra, etc. Prahlada granted him a boon, and Indra wished him to acquire Prahlada's nature (cila). Prahlada was filled with fear, but granted the boon. A flame of light issued out of his body: it was the embodiment of his nature, which was going away and entered the body of Indra. Then a similar apparition issued out: it was Righteousness; then Truth; then Good Deeds; then Might; then Prosperity, that informed him that the brahman was Cakra. Asked by Duryodhana, Dhrtarashtra told him how moral conduct (cila) might be acquired (XII, 124). The characteristics of Hope; "Duryodhana destroyed the hope I had cherished," said Yudhishthira. The discourse between R.-r. Sumitra (of the Haihaya race) and Rehabha. Sumitra, when hunting, was led away by a deer that he had pierced with an arrow; he shot at it again, but in vain (XII, 125); arrived at an asylum he asked R. about Hope (XII, 126); Rehabha told him that he had visited Badari, the asylum of Nara and Narayana, where the sage Acvaçiras reads the Vedas; "having performed my ablutions in the lake and offered oblations of water to P. and D., I entered the asylum: not far from that spot I entered another retreat. where I beheld a very tall and emaciated R., Tunu, exceedingly feeble; he began to discourse in the midst of R.; a king came with his forces and ladies on a chariot drawn by fleet steeds; the name of this king was Viradyumna; his son and only child Bharidyumna had been missing, and Viradyumna came there in course of his wanderings amidst the forest in pursuit of the missing one. Tanu said that a R. had been insulted by Bhūridyumna, who, asked by him for a golden jar and vegetable barks, contemptuously had refused to gratify the ascetic, who became disappointed (XII, 127). Tanu hung down his head; in former days he had been disappointed by the king, and he had practised penances for a long time, and determined to drive away hope from his mind. He then discoursed about the slenderness of Hope. Then he caused the lost prince to be brought thither, rebuked the king, and displayed himself to be the god of righteousness." Thus addressed by Rehabha, king Sumitra gave up his hope (XII, 128). Bhishma cited the old narrative of the discourse between Gautama and Yama. Gautama owned a wide retreat on the Paripatra hills; for 60,000 years he underwent ascetic austerities there. One day Lp. Yama (Dharma) came and spoke about truth, etc. (XII, 129). How may a king in great danger and distress left by his friends behave? (XII, 130).

[Rājanyamahābhāgya(m)] ("the grandeur of the kshatriyas"). § 467 (Mūrk.): To the horse-sucrifice of king Ashlaka Vaiçvamitri all kings repaired, also his brothers Pratardana, Vasumanas, and Çibi Auçinara. After the sacrifice was completed, these four took Narada on their chariot and asked him who of them (as they were all blessed with long life and virtuous) should first fall from Heaven? Narada answered that Ashtaka should first come down. because he had praised himself for having given away thousands of kine; then Pratardana, because he, though he had given to brahmans successively the four horses yoked to his chariot, and then had drawn the chariot himself, had done so with detraction (asilyati); then Vasumanas, because he, though he had twice at the scastiracana for the sake of a flowery chariot (pushparathasya, v. 13313, see the note of PCR., p. 601) given the chariot to Narada, because he praised it, had not done so on a third occasion; Narada himself would come down before Cibi, because Cibi, at the request of Vidhatr in the disguise of a brahman, who was desirous of trying Cibi, had cooked his son Brhadgarbha as food for the brahman without being angry, though the brahman meanwhile had set fire to Cibi's abode and treasury and arsonal, and when the brahman ordered Cibi himself to eat his son's body Cibi was willing to do it; but the brahman said, "Thou hast conquered wrath, there is nothing that thou canst not give to the brahmans," and withdrew his hand, and then Cibi beheld his son like a child of the gods, while the brahman disappeared; and that Cibi had not done this for fame or wealth, etc., but because this is not practised by the sinful (III, 198).

[Rājasūyārambhaparvan(°va)] ("the beginning of the rājasūya sucrifice," the 22nd of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Rājasūyasya ārambhah.)—§ 272: Yudhishthira consulted his counsellors, brothers, ptrijes, ministers, Dhaumya, Draipāyana, etc., as to the rajasays ("in which rshis of austere vows establish six fires singing mantras of the Samaveda: at the conclusion thereof the performer, when installed in the sovereignty, is rewarded with the fruit of all sacrifices, including the darvihomas"). They all encouraged him to perform it. All people lived happily under his sway and loved him (therefore he was called Ajātaçatru); Bhīma ruled over all men justly, Arjuna protected the people from enemies, Sahadeva administered justice impartially, Nakula behaved towards everybody with humility. There was no extertion, disease, etc. Yudhishthira sent a messenger to Kyshna in Dvaravati, and Kyshna came to Indraprastha accompanied by Indrasona, and was consulted by Yudhishthira (II, 13). - § 273: Krshna said that Yudhishthira, in order to become samrāj, ought to slay the Magadha king Jarasandha, and deliver the princes whom Jarasandha held shut up in a mountain hole in order to sacrifice them to Mahadera (i.e. Civa). "The now existing kehatriyas are descended from the remnants of those who were exterminated by Rama. They represent themselves to be the descendants of Aila and Ikshrāku; of those there are 100 families. The Bhojas, descendants of Yayati, are great and scattered all over the earth; but now Jarasandha, ruling the middle land (i.e. Mathura, Nil.), has overpowered them. His allies are (1) Cicupala, who has become his senapati; (2) the Karūsha king Vakra, who fights by illusion (māyāyodhin); (3-4) Hamsa and Dimbhaka (see below); (5-8) Dantavakra, Karūsha, Karabha, Meghavāhana; (9) Bhagadatta, the Yavana king, the ruler of the west, who bears on his head the most wonderful gem on earth, the old friend of thy father, and who chastises Muru and Naraka; he obeys Jarāsandha, but in his heart he is tied by affection to thee; (10) the king of Anga, Vanga, Pundra, and of the Kiratas, Paundraka Vasudeva, who among the Cedis is called Purushottama, and always bears, from foolishness, the distinctive signs of Krehna; (11) Bhishmaka, king of the Bhojas, the friend of Indra, who governs a fourth part of the world, who by his learning has conquered the Pandyas, Krathas, and Kaiçikas, and whose brother Akrti is like to Rama Jamadagnya, has placed himself under Jarasandha, though Arshna, etc., his relatives, are engaged every day in doing what is agreeable to him. Only Yudhishthira's maternal uncle, the Kunti king Purujit, who has his dominions in the west and the south, regards Yudhishthira with affection. The following peoples have fled for fear of Jarasandha: (1) the eighteen tribes of the northern Bhojas have fled towards the west; (2-10) the Curasenas, Bhadrakaras, Bodhas, Çalvas, Pataccaras, Susthalas, Mukuttas (B. Suo). Kulindas, and Kuntis; (11-13) the Calvayana kings with their brethren and followers, the southern Pañcalas, and the eastern Koçalas, have all fied to the Kuntis (?); (14-15) the Matsyas and the Sannyastapadas (? so B.; C. Sanyao) have left their dominions in the north and fled into the southern country; (16) all the Pancalas have fled in all directions." Jarasandha's relations to the Yadaras were the following: Kamsa, having persecuted the Yadavas, married Asti and Prapti, daughters of Jarasandha and sisters of Sahadeva, and began also to oppress the old chiefs of the Bhojas, who sought the help of Krshna, etc.; Krshna bestowed upon Akrura the daughter of Ahuka, and with Sankarshana (i.e. Balarama) he slew Kames and Sunaman. Then Jardsandha took up arms, and the eighteen tribes (kulair ashtadaçavaraih (?), differently NII.) thought they would be unable to check him even in 300 years. His friends Hamsa and Dimbhaka were incapable of being slain by weapons. Some other king, named Hamsa (differently Nil.), was slain by Rama in the battle of the eighteen tribes (ashtadaçavare?); then Dimbhaka, thinking that he could not live without Hamsa, killed himself in the Yamund, and Hamsa, hearing that, also jumped into the Yamuna; then Jarasandha returned to his kingdom, and the Yadayas continued to live at Mathura. But the widow of Kamsa (PCR. Hamsa), the daughter of Jarasandha, urging him to revenge the death of her husband, the Yadavas fled from Mathura, and took up their abode in Kuçasthali (i.e. Draravati), adorned by Raivata, and strongly fortified the Gomanta mountains, three yojanas in length. "In the race of Krohna there are 8,000 brothers [and cousins, PCR.]. Ahuka has 100 sons. Carudeshna with his brother, Cakradeva, Sātyaki, Krehņa, Rauhineya (i.e. Balarāma), and Cāmba (like Cauri in battle) are seven heroes (rathah); Krtararman, Anadhrehti, Camika, Samitinjaya, Kanka, Canku, and Kunti are seven maharathas: then there are also two sons of Andhakabhoja and himself; all these heroes, remembering the middle country, are now living among the Vyshnis" (II. 14).- § 274: Yudhishthira had some scruples, which were opposed by Bhima and Krehna, who cited from the Krta age five kiugs, who had become emperors (samrāj): Yauvanāçvi (i.e. Māndhātr) by the remission of taxes (B. jilvā jayyān, "by victories"), Bhagīratha by protection, [Arjuna-] Lartavirya by asceticism, Bharata by strength, and Marutta by prosperity; 100 families of kings have been unable to oppose Jarasandha; he has already brought eighty-six kings to the house of Pacupati (i.e. Civa); when he has fourteen more he will offer them as sacrifices (II, 15).-Some further objections of Yudhishthira are refuted by Arjuna (II, 16).- § 275: The origin of Jarasandha was the following: The Magadha king Brhadratha, who had three akshauhinis of troops, married the two twin daughters of the king of Kaçi, making an engagement never to show a preference for either. As he was childless he repaired to the rshi Canda-Kauçika, the son of Kakshivat Gautama, who was sitting under a mango-tree. He gave a mango fruit to the king, who gave it to his queens. They then brought forth each one half of a child, which were thrown away, but, found and laid together by the rakshasi Jara, became one living child (II, 17).-Jarā had been created by Srayambhū for the destruction of the Danavas and named Grhadevi (grhe grhe manushyanam nityam tishthami rakehasi, v. 730), and always lived in the king's house and did him good, because there was on the walls a likeness of her endued with youth and in the midst of children, and she was daily worshipped with scents, etc. The king ordered a great festival to be held in Magadha in honour of Jara, and named the boy Jarasandha (Jaraya sandhito, v. 739) (II, 18). Some time after Canda-Kaucika again came to Magadha, and foretold the greatness of Jarasandha, that weapons should not hurt him, and that he should see Rudra. After having installed Jarasandha, Brhadratha with his two wives retired to the woods and, after practising ascetic penances, ascended When king Kamea was slain by Vasudeva to heaven. (i.e. Krahna), Jarasandha, from Girivraja, whirling a mace ninety-nine times, hurled it towards Mathura, where Krehna was residing at that time; the mace fell at Gadavasana, near Mathura, at a distance of ninety-nine yojanas [from Girivraja, PCR.]. He, with Hamea and Dimbhaka (who were skilled in the niticatra, v. 765), were more than a match for the three worlds; therefore, from policy, the Kukuras, Andhakas, and Vrshnis, chose not to fight with him (II, 19).

Rājasūyasya ārambha(h) ("the beginning of the rājasūya sacrifice"). § 11(Parvasangr.): I, 2, 408 (rājasūyasya carambhab, i.e. Rūjasūyārambhaparvan).

Rājasūyika(m) parva[n] ("the section relating to the Rājasūya sacrifice"). § 10 (Parvas.): I, 2, 318 (parva . . .  $R^{\circ}m$ , i.e. Rājasūyikaparvan).

[Rājasūyikaparvan(°va)] ("the section relating to the Rajasuya sacrifice," the 25th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Rūjasūyikam parva.) § 286 : Under Yudhishihira's rule the people were very happy, and great riches filled the treasury. Then Yudhishthira resolved upon the celebration of the rajasuya. Krshna came there, having appointed Anakudundubhi to the command of the army. Yudhishthira, sitting with Dhaumya, Krehna-Dvaipayana, his brothers, etc., asked Krehna to install himself in that sacrifice or to permit the Pandavas to be installed in it. Krshna said that Yudhishthira ought to perform it and employ himself (i.e. Krshna) in some office. Then Yudhishthira caused his minister (mantrin) Sahadera to get the articles together that Dhaumya might order as required for the sacrifice, and to let Indrasena and Viçoka and Puru, with Arjuna for his charioteer, engage in collecting food. Draipayana himself became the brahman and appointed learned brahmans as rtvijes; Susaman ("the bull of the Dhananjayas") became the samaga, Yajnavalkya the adhvaryu, Paila (the son of Vasu) the hotr accompanied by Dhaumya, and their disciples and sons the hotragas (see BR.) who uttered benedictions, etc. Then Yudhishthira caused Sahadeva to dispatch messengers, who invited men of the four castes. Then the brahmans installed (dikshayan cakrire) Yudhishthira in the rajasaya sacrifice, the guests arrived, the artificers erected habitations, etc. Then Yudhishthira despatched Nakula to Hastinapura in order to fetch Bhishma and Drona, Dhrtarashtra, Vidura, Krpa, etc. (II, 33). Enumeration of kings who came to Yudhishthira's rajasaya (II, 34). - § 288: Yudhishthira saluted Krehna-Draipāyana, etc. (a), and appointed Duhçasana to attend to the food, etc., Acratthaman to the brahmans, Sanjaya to the kings, Bhishma and Drona to see what was done and what left undone, Krps to attend to the diamonds, etc., and the dukshinas; Vidura became the disburser, Duryodhana the receiver of the tributes (arhanani), Krahna washed the feet of the brahmans. Yudhishthira performed the sacrifice with six fires (II, 35) .- § 292 (cf. Cicupalavadhaparvan): Then the sacrifice was completed, watched by Krehna. When the kings departed, the Pandavas, commanded by Yudhishthira, followed them to the confines of his dominions, one after another (a). Kyshna asked leave to go to Dvaraka, being thanked by Yudhishthira for his co-operation, and having bidden farewell to  $Prth\bar{a}$ , etc. ( $\beta$ ), and having performed his ablutions, etc., he welked round the Garuda-bannered chariot, which Daruka had fetched, and ascending it set out for Dvaravati, followed on foot by the Pandavas, till they took leave. Now Duryodhana alone, with king Subala's son Cakuni, remained in the assembly house (II, 45).

[Rājyalābhaparvan(°va)] ("on the Pandavas' getting half of the kingdom," the 15th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Rājyalābha, Rūjyalambha.) § 244: The Pandavas with Kunti and Krshna journeyed towards Hastinapura. Dhrtarushtra despatched Vikarna, Citrasona, Drona, and Krpa to receive them. The inhabitants were filled with joy. In order to prevent any difference between them and their cousins, Dhrtarashtra caused them, with Krshna in the van, to repair to Khandaraprastha, taking half the kingdom. With Draipāyana's assistance they measured out a piece of land for their city, which was very beautiful, and came to be called Indraprastha. Having settled the Pandavas there, Krehna came back with Rama to Dvaravati (I, 207). -§ 245: When the Pandavas were dwelling in happiness at Khandavaprastha, one day the Devarshi Narada came to them, and recommended them to make an arrangement so that disunion might not arise among them for the sake of their common wife, meutioning how Sunda and Upasunda had killed each other for the sake of Tilottama. Yudhishthira asked who those Asuras were, and who this Tilottamā was (I, 208). - § 246: Sundopasundopākhyāna (q.v.). The arrangement the Pandavas made was, that if one of them should be sitting with Draupadi, and one of the other ones should happen to see it, he would have to retire into the forest for twelve years and live as a brahmacarin. Then Narada went away (I, 212).

I (sc. Lomaga) saw him in Ayodhyā when he had been born. Then Rāma Bhārgava, the [grand]son of Reika and the son of Renūkā, went to Ayodhyā with his bow with which he had destroyed the kshatriyas, to see Rama Daçarathi. Dayaratha sent Rama to receive him. Rama Dāçarathi stringed Rāma Bhārgara's bow without exertion and enabled him to see him in his true form and to behold, in his body, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Sadhyas, the ganas of the Maruts, the Pitrs, Hutaçana (i.e. Agni), the nakshatras and planets, the Gandharras, the Rakshasas, the Yakshas, the rivers and tirthas, the eternal rehie named Välakhilyas, who had become identical with Brahman, the Devarshis, the seas and mountains, the Vedas with the Upanishads, the vashatkaras, and the sacrifices, the Samans in their living form (cetamanti), the Dhanurveda, the clouds, rains, and lightnings; then he shot a celestial shaft presented to him by Rama Bhargara; at this the earth was filled with sounds of thunder, etc., and began to quake. Rama Bhargara was for a time deprived of his senses, and the shaft came blazing back into Rama Daçarathi's hands. Rama Bhargara proceeded to the Mahendra mountain, where he dwelt in terror and shame till after a year his pitre, beholding him deprived of energy, caused him to bathe in the sacred river Vadhūsara, especially in the tīrtha Dīptoda, where Bhrgu had practised austerities in the derayuga; by this R. regained his energy (111, 99): 111, 99, 8656 (Bh.), 8658 (Roikanandano Ramo Bhargaro Renukasutah), 8659, 8661, 8662, 8665, 8666, 8668, 8669 (J.), [8671 (Bh.)], 8673 (Bh.), 8679, 8681, 8683, 8686, 8687.—§ 393 (Tirthayatrap.): 111, 115, 10127, 10128 (Bh.), 10129, 10130 (R. appeared to the ascetics on the fourteenth and the eighth [days of the lunar month]) .-- § 394 (Arjuna Kārtavīrya): III, 115, 10131 (J.), 10132 ("eņa niejitāh . . . kshatriyāh), 10134 (J.), 10135 (slew Arjuna the king of the Haihayas). - § 396 (Jamadagni): III, 116, 10174 (fifth son

His son Rama by ascetic penances gratified Bhave (i.e. Civa) in order to obtain weapons; Civa showed himself to him and promised him all weapons when he would become pure; those weapons burn a person who is not deserving of them. With penances, etc., and home performed with mantres Rama adored Civa for many years. Gratified with him Civa repeatedly proclaimed his virtues in the presence of D. and R. Meanwhile the Daityas became very mighty and afflicted the gods, who, having failed to vanquish them, repaired to Civa. Civa summoned Rama and prevailed upon him to slay the Danavas. Then touched by Civa, his wounds were immediately healed, and Civa gave him all the celestial weapons and granted him boons: VIII, 34, 1584, 1587, [1588 (Bh.), 1589 (J.), 1592 (Bh.)], 1593, 1598 (Bh.), [1599 (Bh.)], (1601), 1608, [1605 (Bh.), 1606 (Bh.), 1608 (Bh.), 1610 (Bhrgunandana)], 1611. — § 606 (Karnap.): VIII, 34, [1613 (Bh.), 1614 (Bhrgunandanah)], 1619 (°ciehyah, i.e. Karna). — § 607 (do.): VIII, 37, †1733 (gave Karna an excellent chariot with excellent horses); 40, 1865 (yā gatir gurunā proktā purā Rāmena, says Karna); 41c, 1952 (punah prabhavah Parthasya pauranah Kecavasya ca kathitah . . . Rāma[rājy]ābhisheka ("the anointing of Rāma"). § 543: Having slain Ravana, Rama was worshipped by D., R., and G. uttering jaya; he gave Lanka to Vibhishana, Avindhya came with Sita, whom Rama repudiated. Lakehmana and the monkeys were sorrowful; Brahmán appeared on his chariot, etc. (a); Sītā swore by Mātariçran, etc.  $(\beta)$ , that she was innocent. A celestial voice was heard, Vāyu, etc. (γ) attested her innocence. Brahmán said that it was by his grace that Ravana (the enemy of D., G., N., Y., Da., M.-r.) had been unslayable; but Sītā had been protected by the curse of Nalakūbara. Dacaratha commanded him to take back his wife and rule his kingdom at Avodhya. his exile of fourteen years was over. Rama gave boons to Avindhya and Trijata. Brahman and the gods, headed by Indra, granted Rama adherence to virtue and invincibility, and the monkeys were restored to life. Stta granted to Hanumat, that his life might last as long as the fame of Rāma, and gave him celestial wines and drinks. Mātali said: "Thou hast dispelled the sorrows of D., G., Y., As., N., and men, and therefore all creatures with D., As., G., Y., Ra., and Pn. will always speak of thee." Having made arrangements for the protection of Lanka, Rama, etc. (δ) recrossed the bridge riding on Pushpaka, at the seashore he dismissed the monkeys with presents, then he re-entered Kishkindhya, where he installed Angada as yuvaraja. Having reached Ayodhya he dispatched Hanumat as envoy to Bharata: Then he entered Nandigrama and saw Bharata and Catrughna, Bharata made the kingdom over to him. Vasishtha and Vāmadeva installed him in the sovereignty under the nakehatra which belongs to Vishnu (Vaishnave, i.e. Cravana, Nil.). Then he dismissed Sugriva, Vibhishana, etc., and gave Pushpaka back to Kubera. He then performed ten jarathya horse-sacrifices on the Gomati (III, 291).

Rāma-Rāvana-yuddha ("the combat between Rāma and Rāvaṇa"). § 537: Headed by Rāvaṇa many small Rākshasas and Piçācas, viz. Parvaṇa, etc. (a), invisible penetrated among the monkeys. Vibhīshaṇa broke the spell of their invisibility, and they were all slain. Rāvaṇa with the Rākshasas and Piçācas formed the array named after Uçanas (Auçanasaṃ vyūhaṃ). Rāma disposed his troops after the rule of Brhaspati (Bārhaspatyaṃ vidhiṃ). Rāvaṇa fought with Rāma, etc. (b), then an encounter came about with celestial weapons of great force (III, 285).

Rāmopākhyāna <sup>2</sup> ("the episode relating to Rūma Jāmadagnya"). § 638b (Rūjadh.): Jahnu > Aja > Balūkāçva - Kuçika, who performed penances in order to get a son; Indra became his son:

Reika destined a certain portion of the sacrificial food (wherein had been placed the brahman energy) for Satyavati, which would give her a son of great wisdom, the foremost of brahmans; and another (wherein had been placed the sum total of kshatriya energy) for her mother, which would give her for a son an invincible kshatriya. Then Reika proceeded to the woods to practise penances. King Gādhi, on a tīrthayātrā, arrived at Reika's retreat with his queen. There the mother of Satyacatī, from ignorance, exchanged the two portions of the food. Reika predicted that the son of Satyavatī would become a terrible kshatriya, but asked by Satyavatī, he granted that not her son (Jamadagni) but her grandson (Paracu: Rāma) would become such; her mother. would give birth to a brahman (Viçvamitra). Besides the other sciences, Kama mastered the Dhanurveda; gratifying Muhaders on Gandhamadans, he asked him for weapons, especially the axe, which made him unrivalled on earth. Meanwhile the virtuous kehatriya, the Haihaya king Arjuna Kartavirya, who had got 1,000 arms through the grace of Dattatreya, having subjugated the whole earth with its mountains and seven islands, became a powerful emperor, and gave away the earth to the brahmans at a horsesacrifice. Once, solicited by Agni, he gave alms to that deity: springing from the points of his shafts, Agni burnt villages, etc., and also the retreat of Apava (i.e. Vasishiha, Nil.), who cursed Arjuna, saying that Rama should lop off his arms. Arjuna, always devoted to peace, always regardful of brahmans, etc., did not think of that curse. His sons, always haughty and cruel, seized and brought away the calf of Jamadagni's homa-cow, without the knowledge of Arjuna; Rama lopped off the arms of Arjuna and brought back the calf; the sons of Arjuna came and slew Jamadagni, in the absence of Rama, who vowed to free the earth of kshatrivas, and slaughtered all the sons and grandsons of Arjuna, and thousands of Haihayas, and annihilated all kshatriyas, and then, filled with compassion, retired into the woods. After some thousands of years, the grandson of Viçvamitra and son of Raibhya, Paravasu said to Rama in public: "were not Pratardans, etc., who were assembled at a sacrifice at the time of Yayati's full, kshatriyas by birth; thou art not true of thy vow; through fear of kshatriya heroes thou hast betaken threelf to the mountains." Rama once more slew kshatriyas by hundreds. Those kshatriyas, however, that he spared, counted by hundreds, multiplied and became mighty monarchs on carth. Rama once more slaughtered them, not sparing the very children. Some kshatriya ladies, however, succeeded in protecting their children. Having made the earth destitute of kshatriyas twenty-one times, Rāma, at the completion of a horsesacrifice, gave away the earth as a sacrificial present to Kaçyapa. In order to preserve the romnant of the kshatriyas, Kaçyapa told Rāma to repair to the shores of the southern ocean and not to reside within his dominion. The ocean suddenly created Curparaka for Rama. Kaçyapa gave the earth to the brahmans and then entered the great forest. Then cudras and vaicuas began to cohabit with the wives of brahmans; unprotected duly by kehatriyas, the earth quickly sank, and was held by Kacyapa on his lap (uru), whence she was called Urvi. For protection's sake she asked Kaçyapa for a king, saying that she had concealed some Haihaya kshatriyas among women; [further] Paurava (son of Viduratha), brought up among bears in the Rkshavat mountain; [further] a son of Saudūsa, protected through compassion by Paraçara, and named Sarvakarman (etymology); Cibi's son Gopati, brought up in the forest among kine; Pratardana's son Vatsa, brought up among calves in a cowpen; Dadhivahana's grandson and Diviratha's son, concealed on the banks of Ganga by Gautama; Brhadratha, protected by apes (? golangulaih, cf. BR.; PCR.: wolves) on Grdhrakufa; many kehatriyas belonging to the race of Marutta have been brought up by the ocean; they are living among artisans and goldsmiths; "their fathers and grandfathers have been slain for my sake by Rama; it is my duty to see that their funeral rites are duly performed." Kacyapa, seeking out those / kshatriyas, installed them duly as kings in days of yore.

Those kehatriya races that are now extant are the progeny of those princes.

Ramopakhyanaparvan ("the episode relating to Rama'," i.e. the subject-matter of the Ramayana; it is the 48th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Ramopakhyana, Ramayana.) § 525 : As Yudhishthira asked Markandeya if he knew any one more unfortunate than he was (III, 273), Markandeya related the story of Rama Daçarathi: King Aja of Ikshvaku's race had a son Daçaratha, who had four virtuous sons: Rama (son of Kausalya), Lakshmana and Catrughna (sons of Sumitra), and Bharata (son of Kaikeyi). Sita, the daughter of the Videha king Janaka, was created by Tvashtr himself to become the wife of Rama. Prajapati (Pitamaha, Svayambha, the Creator of all the worlds) had a mind-born son Pulastya, who with a cow begat a son Vaicravana (i.e. Kubera). Leaving his father, Vaicravana went to his grandfather, and angered at this, his father with half of his own self became born as Vicravas for wreaking vengeance on Vaicravana. But Pitamaha, pleased with Vaicravana, gave him immortality and made him the sovereign of wealth (Dhaneça), a lokapāla and friend of Īçāna, and gave him a son Nalakubara, and Lanka for his capital, guarded by hosts of Rakshasas, and the vimana Pushpaka capable of going everywhere, and the kingship of the Yakshas, etc. (III, 274).- § 526: The muni Vicravas was greatly enraged against Vaicravana. Kubera (Naravahana), the king of the Rakshasas, always sought to please his father, and, living in Lanka, sent three Rakshasa women (a) skilled in singing and dancing to wait upon him. Pulastyagranted them boons: to Pushpotkata two sons: Kumbhakarna and Daçagrīva (= Rāvana); Mālinī bore one son, Vibhīshana; Rākā became the mother of the twins Khara and Curpanakha. Vibhishana surpassed everybody in beauty and was very pious; Daçagriva was energetic and strong; Kumbhakarna was the most powerful in battle and a master of illusion; Khara was proficient in archery and hostile to brahmans; Curpanakhā troubled the ascetics (siddhavighnakari). Learned in the Vedas, they lived with their father on Gandhamadana. And there they beheld Vaicravana seated with their father, and seized with jealousy, they gratified Brahman with severe penances (3), while Khara and Curpanakha protected and attended on them. After 1,000 years Daçagriva, cutting off his head (i.e. heads), offered it (i.e. them) in the fire, and Brahman appeared and made them desist from their austerities, granting them boons  $(\gamma)$  except immortality. Now Daçagriva defeated Kubera in battle and drove him from Lanka; Kubera then, followed by Gandharvas, Yakehas, Rakshasas, and Kinnaras, went to live on Gandhamadana. Ravana took from him Pushpaka, upon which Vaicravana eursed him saying: "This chariot shall never carry thee, but him who will slay thee in battle, and as thou hast insulted thy elder brother thou shalt soon die." Vibhishana followed Kubera, who invested him with the command of the Yaksha and Rakshasa hosts. On the other hand, the man-eating Rakshasas and Picacas anointed Dacagries as their sovereigu. Daçagrīva deprived the gods and Daityas of their valuable possessions, and because he terrified (ravayam asa, v. 15928) all creatures, he was called Ravana (III, 275). The Brahmarshis, Siddhas, and Devarshis, with Agni as their spokesman, sought the protection of Brahmán, who said that the four-armed Vishou had already been incarnate for this object, and caused Indra and the gods, Gandharvae, and Danasas to beget strong sons, capable of assuming any form at will, on monkeys and bears; and the Gandharet Dundubhi he caused to be born on earth as the hunchbacked Manthard, who, instructed by Brahman, went hither and thither ever engaged in fomenting quarrels (III, 276) .-§ 527: Asked by Yudhishthira, Markandeya related: The sons of Dacaratha were conversant with the Vedas and the Dhanurveda. Rama equalled Indra and Brhaspati. At night, the Pushya being in a lucky conjuncture, Rama was to be invested as yuvarāja. Mantharā aroused the jealousy of Kaikeyi against Kausalya, Kaikeyi prevailed upon Dacaratha that Bharata should be anointed and Rama be in exile in the forest of Dandaka for fourteen years. Rama was accompanied by Lakshmana and Sita. Dacaratha died. Bharata rebuked Kaikeyi and set off to find Rama, accompanied by Kausalya. Sumitra, Kaikeyi, Catrughna, Vasishtha, Vamadeva, etc. He saw Rama and Lakshmana on the mountain Citrakūța, but Rāma would adhere to the order of his father. Bharata then ruled in Nandigrāma, keeping before him the shoes of Rāma.- § 528: Rāvaņagamana (q.v.).—§ 529 : Sītüharaņa (q.v.).—§ 530 : Vicedvasumokshana (q.v.).-§ 531: Having bathed in the lake Pampa, Rama and Lakshmana on the mountain Rehyamaka beheld the monkey-king Sugriva (whom his brother Valin had deprived of his wife Tara and his kingdom) and his four counsellors, Handmat (equalling Himavat), etc. Sugriva showed Rama a piece of cloth that had been dropped by Sītā. Sugrīva promised to bring back Sītā. Rāma installed Sugrice as king of all the monkeys and promised to slay Valin. Then they all repaired to Kishkindhya. Valin came out; Tard (who understood the voice of every creature) told him that it was Rama, Lakshmana, Mainda, Dvivida, Hanumat, Jambarat (the king of the bears), and Sugriva who had come to destroy him. Valin suspected Tara. Near the mountain Malyavat he had an encounter with Sugriva. Hanumat placed a garland round Sugriva's neck (so that he shone like the mountain Malaya), and Rama recognized Sugriva by that sign and killed Valin with an arrow. Sugriva thus regained Kishkindhya and Tara. Rushadgu (II, 324), v. Vṛshadgu.

Rushangu, a brahman. § 6151 (Baladevatīrthayātrā): R. was an old brahman always devoted to ascetic penances. Resolved to give up his body he told his sons to take him to Prthūdaka on the Sarasvatī (with hundreds of tīrthas and on whose banks dwelt rshis unconnected with the world). There R. bathed according to due rites and then said to his sons: "He who would abandon his body in Prthūdaka on the northern bank of the Sarasvatī while employed in mentally reciting sacred mantras (japyaparah) would never again be afflicted with deuth" (nainam çvo maranam tapet, v. Nīl.): 1X, 39, 2270, 2273, 2275.

Rushardika, a king. § 562 (Bhagavadyānap.): V. 74γ, 2730 (Surāshṭrāṇāṃ, among the wicked kings who annihilated their kinsmen and relatives).

Rshyacrnga (B. Rçya°), a muni, son of Vibhāṇdaka. § 11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 443 (°sya caritram, cf. § 391).- § 270 (Brahmasabhav.): 11, 11, 440 (in the pulace of Bruhmán) .--§ 390d (Tirthayatrap.): R., the son of Kaçyapa (i.e. Vibhandaka) born by a hind, caused Indra to rain during a drought in the territory of Lomapada, who gave him his daughter Çanta: III, 110, 9991.- § 391 (do.): III, 110, 2994.- § 391 (cf. do.). The viprarshi Vibhandaka Kaçyapa practising austerities near a great lake saw the Apsaras Urvaçi, whence his semen fell into the water and was lapped up by a hind, that was drinking. That hind was a daughter of the gods (devakanya). Brahmán had transformed her into a hind, and when she had given birth to a muni she would be freed. She now gave birth to a son, who was named Rshyaçringa, because there was a horn on his head. He passed his days in the forest, devoted to brahmacarya, and he had never seen any human being except his father. At that time the king of the Angas, Lomapada, a friend of Daçaratha, had been shunned by the brahmans and was without a purchita, because he had been guilty of falsehood towards a brahman and therefore Indra did not give rain in his territory. At the advice of a wise brahman he did atonement for his sins and appeared the brahmans. Thereafter he assembled his ministers in order to discuss means for bringing R. to his land. According to their counsel a courtezan with a number of women, etc., was sent to R. (III, 110). She had constructed a floating hermitage which she moored at a short distance from Vibhandaka's hermitage, and then sent her daughter, a courtezan, to Rshyaçriga. She refused the fruits, foot-washing, etc., saying that her religious vows consisted in not receiving such things, but implied that she might embrace him. By giving him unsuitable food, garlands, beautiful garments, and drinks, and by playing and clasping him in her arms, she made him overpowered with love, and as she went away under the pretext of performing the agnihotra, he became sud. When Vibhandaka (b) returned he wondered that R, was not splitting the logs for fuel, etc., and asked who had been there (III, 111). R. said that a religious student (brahmacarin) had come to him; he had a mass of hair (jatilah) and a pair of ornaments upon his wrist like his rosary (akshamālā); his matted hair (jafah) was neatly tied up and adhered to the forehead and was divided in two, etc. He (R.) wished to go to him and see him every day (III, 112). Vibhandaka declared that it was a Rakshasa, and in vain spent three days in searching for this one. When Vibhandaka had gone out to collect fruits the courtezans allured R. to enter the bark, which they unmoored, and in this way they brought him to Lomapāda, who prepared a beautiful forest named Nāvyāçrama ("Floating hermitage") and kept R. in the female apartments. Suddenly rain poured down. Lomapada gave his daughter Canta to R. When Vibhandaka was going to Campa in order to burn the king, the city, and his whole territory, the king let kine be placed and fields ploughed along the road, and ordered the cowherds to honour Vibhandaka with hospitality when he was fatigued and hungry, and to say that all this belonged to his son and that they were his slaves. Thus Vibhandaka was appeased. According to the command of his father R., as soon as a son had been born to him, returned to his father in the wood, and Canta followed and obeyed him, as Indrasona Narayani was ever obedient to Mudgala, etc. (111, 113): III, 110, 9999, 10000, 10006, 10007 (origin of the name), 10014, 10018, 10021, 10024 (rsheh sutam); III, †10034, (†10035), (†10039), †10041, †10043, †10044, †10045; 112, (†10051); 113. †10075 (munim), $10076, $10080, $10091, $10093. - $ 677 (Mokshadh.); XII, 235, 8609 (Lomapadaç ca rajarshih Çantam dastva sutam prabhuh | Roaya vipulath sarvakamair ayujyata, all. to § 391).—§ 702 (do.): XII, 2978, 10874 (Kūcyapah? Sabhā = Sabhāparvan. § 4 (Anukram ): I, 1, 88 (°āraņyavitankarān, 8c. Bhāratadrumah).

Sabhadraka, pl. (X, 381), v. Prabhadraka, pl.

Sabhākriyā ("building of the palace") § 11 (Purvusangr.): 1, 2, 407 (Paṇdavānōṃ, i.e. Sabhākriyāparvan).

Sabhākriyāparvan ("the section relating to the building of the palaco," the 20th of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr. Cf. Sabhākriyā). § 261: Maya said he was a great artist (mahākarr), the Vigrakarman of the Danacas, and asked Arjuna to tell him what he was to do for him, because he had been rescued by him. Arjuna told him to do something for Krshna (lokanāthah Prajapatih, v. 9), who asked him to build a palace for Yudhishthira. Maya was introduced to Yudhishthira, and recited the history of the Asura (puriadeva caritam), i.e. of Vrshaparvan (so Nil.). Then on an auspicious day, after the initiatory rites, and having gratified thousands of brahmans, he measured out a piece of land 10,000 kishkus square (II, 1). -§ 262: Kyshna departed for Dvārakā (v. Bhagavadyana) .- § 263 : To the north of Kailana, near Mainaka, there is a huge mountain named Hiranyacriga, consisting of jewels. Near this mountain is situated the lake Bindusaras, where King Bhagiratha had dwelt for many years, desiring to behold the Gangā. There the lord of all beings (i.e. Prajapati, Nil ) had performed 100 sacrifices, where, for the sake of embellishment, though not according to rule (dyshfantatah), the sacrificial stakes were made of gems and the alturs (caityah) of gold. There the 1,000-eyed Cacipati had become perfect (siddhem gatah) by sacrifice. There Bhūtapati (= Mahūdera, Nīl.) took up his abode after having created all the worlds, and there he dwells, worshipped by thousands of spirits (bhūtaih). There Nara and Nārāyaṇa, Brahman, Yama, and Sthanu perform their sacrifices at the expiration of 1,000 yugas. There Vasudera has performed sattras for many years, and placed thousands and tens of thousands of sacrificial stakes adorned with golden garlands and altars of great splendour. There Maya, when the Danavas wished to perform a sacrifice on the bank of the Bindusaras, had made utensils of gems from the house of Vrshaparran. That wealth, which was guarded by Yakshas and Rakshasas, he brought away, and thereof constructed the palace of Yudhishthira. A club with which Vrshaparran had slain all foes in battle, and which had been placed in Bindusaras, Maya gave to Bhimasena; the conch-shell Devadatta, that came from Varuna, and was also there, he gave to Arjuna; at its sound all creatures trembled in awe. The palace surpassed the Sudharma of Krshna and the palace of Brahmán, and covered an area of 10,000 kishkus square. Eight thousand Rakshasas, called Kinkaras, guarded and supported the palace. In it was a tank, whose lotuses were of dark-coloured gems, etc.; many kings mistook it for solid ground, and fell into it. The palace was constructed in seventeen months (11, 3) .-- § 264: Enumeration of rshis (a) and kings ( $\beta$ ) from various countries, who were present when Yudhishthia, after having fed 10,000 brahmans, etc., entered the palace. Also Tumburu, the friend of Dhananjaya, and the Gandharra Citrasena with his ministers, and many other Gandharvas and Apsarases and Kinnaras came there (11, 4).

He subdued the Hachayas and the Talajanghas. His wives were Vasdarbhi and Caibya. With them he on Kailasa practised ascetic austerities in order to obtain a son, and practising yoga he succeeded in seeing Civa, who said that owing to the muharta at which S. had addressed his prayers to him, one of the wives of S. would have 60,000 sons of exceeding pride, who should perish altogether, and the other wife would have one valorous son, who would perpotuate the race of S. Then Cira disappeared and S. and his wives went home. Vaidarbhi after some time brought forth a gourd and Caibyā a beautiful son. As S. was about to throw away the gourd, a voice from the sky told him Sāgara—Sahadeva. 604 to take out the seeds and preserve them in steaming vessels partly filled with clarified butter, as they would become 60,000 sons (III, 106). The rajarshi S. did as he was told, and provided a nurse for every receptacle. When they were born their acts were ruthless, they were able to roam about in the sky and harassed the gods, the Gandharras, the Rākshasas, and all beings. The gods, etc., went to Brahmán, who dismissed them saving that in a short time the sons of S. would be destroyed. When after some time they were protecting S's sacrificial horse who roamed over the world, the horse suddenly disappeared when it had come to the waterless soa. Having told S. that the horse had been stolen, they were commanded to search for it, but they did not find it. S. then filled with wrath forbade them to return without the horse. They then began to dig the sea with spades, etc., and killed Asurus, Uragas (snakes), Rākshasas, and other beings by hundreds and thousands. After a long time they dug down to Pātāla in the north-eastern region, and seeing the horse there they ran after it without heeding Kapila ("whom they say is Vasudeva," v. 8880), who was present there. Kapila then burnt them to ashes. Narada told it to S., who sent for Angumat, the son of his son Asamañjas, whom he had abandoned according to his duty and for the good of the citizens: 111, 106, 8830, 8831 (1kshrākunām kule jātah), 8841; 107, 8859 (rājā), 8869 (°ātmajāḥ), 8871 (do.), 8876 (do.), 8882 (°āntikaṃ).—§ 388 (Asamañjas): III, 107, 8887, 8888 (Asamañjāḥ . . . Sainyaniryāṇa(m) ("the marching out of the troops").

§ 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 333 (i.e. Sainyaniryāṇaparvan).

[Sainyaniryanaparvan("va)] ("the section relating to the marching out of the troops," the 63rd of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Sainyaniryana). § 570: The Pandavas had seven akshauhinis led by Drupada, etc. (a). Yudhishthira consulted with his brothers about the election of a generalissimo, who might also withstand Bhishma. Sahadera, etc., proposed Viraja, etc. (B). Krshna named Dhrshtadyumna, who was elected. Then they marched out to Kurukshetra (description), with Bhīma in the van, etc. ( $\gamma$ ). Draupadī with her ladies, etc., remained at Upaplavya. The Kekaya princes, etc. (8) marched behind Yudhishthira, keeping him in their centre. In the rear were Virața, etc.  $(\epsilon)$ , 40,000 chariots, etc. Anadhrshti, etc. (ζ) marched surrounding Krshna and Arjuna. Entering Kurukshetra, they blew their conches, also Krshna and Arjuna; Pāñcajanya filled them with joy (V, 152). Yudhishthira encamped on Kurukshetra. Kṛshṇa, etc. ( $\eta$ ) each did some special work. At the holy Hirangati (an excellent tirtha, with sacred water, without pointed pebbles and mire), Krshna caused a most to be excavated. There were assembled hundreds upon hundreds of skilled mechanics in receipt of regular wages, and surgeons and physicians, etc. Then their allies began to march thither (V, 152). When Krshna had departed, Duryodhana urged Karna, Duhçasana, and Cakuni to make preparations for battle, which was fixed to commence the next morning (I, 153). At the request of Yudhishthira, Krehna related Duryodhana's, etc., project of imprisoning him; "neither Bhīshma nor Drona said anything on that subject; indeed, all of them follow Duryodhana, except Vidura. . . . War is that which should now take place." Yudhishthira gave order to array the troops, but then he complained that he should slay his preceptors, etc. Arjuna reminded him of what Kunti and Vidura had said through Krehng, and Krehna affirmed it. The Pandaras and their soldiers passed the night in great happiness (V, 154). After that night had passed away, Duryodhana arranged his eleven akshauhinis (description), under Krpa, etc. (0) (V, 155). Referring to a contest between the brahmans. whom also the vaicyas and the cudras followed, and the kshatriyas among the Haihayas (b), Duryodhana urged Bhishma to become their generalissimo. Bhishma said that he did not see upon earth the warrior that was equal to him, except Arjuna; but Arjuna would never openly fight with him; Bhishma said he could, in a trice, destroy the universe with D., As., Ra., and men; but the Pandavas he could not exterminate; but he would slav every day 10,000; and either Karna or Bhishma should fight first. Karna declared he would not fight before Bhishma was slain; then he would fight with Arjuna. Then Blitchma was solemnly installed, under a bloody shower, etc. Then they marched out to Kurukshetra, and Duryodhana and Kurna caused the camps to be measured out on a level part of the plain (V, 156). When Yudhishthira heard that Bhishma had been installed in the command of the Kuru army, he summoned his brothers and Vasudeva, and selected seven leaders for his seven akshauhinis: Drupada, etc. (1) (cf. a!), and above them all Dhrehtadyumna; and Dhananjaya (i.e. Arjuna) of curly hair was made the leader of all those leaders; and Krshna the leader of Arjuna and driver of his steeds. Halāyudha (i.e. Balarāma), etc. (x) came there, and Yudhishthira, etc. (A) rose from their seats and offered worship to Halayudha. Halayudha said that a fierce slaughter was inevitable, that the Pandavas would certainly win because of the help of Krshna, that he had repeatedly tried to prevail upon Krshna to remain neuter; that he would himself do; but as he could not be without Krshna, he would repair to the tirthas of the Sarasvati. Then he set out for his tirthayatra (V, 157). About this time there came to the Pandava camp Bhishmaka's (c) son Rukmin (d). He entered the camp with an akshauhing of troops, from desire of doing what was agreeable to Vasudera. He offered Arjuna his assistance, if he was afraid. He would slay everyone: Drona, etc. (µ). Arjuna, mentioning his exploits against the G., at Khāndava, against the Nivātakavacas und Kālakeyas, at Virāţa's city, and that he had paid his respects for battle's sake to Rudra, etc. ( $\nu$ ), would not say he was afraid. Rukmin then went to Duryodhana, saying the same words, and was rejected in the same way. Then the Pandaras again consulted, presided over by Yudhishthira (V, 158). Dhrtarashtra asked Sanjaya to tell him all that had happened in the matter of encamping, and complained that though he understood the defects, he could not withstand Duryodhana. Sanjaya said that he ought not to impute the fault only to Duryodhana: "as to our acts, some say that everything is ordained by God; some that they are the result of free-will; others that they are the result of those of our past lives" (V, 159).

[Sainyodyogaparvan(°va)] ("the section relating to the preparations before warfare," the 57th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). § 554: After the nuptials of Abhimanyu the Kurus, etc. (a) next morning assembled in the presence chamber of Virāṭa. Kṛshṇa spoke about the affairs of the Pāṇḍavas, and proposed to send an ambassador to Duryodhana, etc., in order to induce them to give hulf the kingdom to Yudhishṭhira (V, 1). Baladeva approved of it, and said that the ambassador ought to salute Bhishma, etc. (β), that Yudhishṭhira had been wrong in challenging Çakuni, and that Duryodhana only ought to be addressed in a conciliatory tone, that war might be avoided (V, 2). Sātyaki severely blamed Baladeva, and assorted that it was Y dhishṭhira who had been challenged in the game at dice, that he could not have declined according to the rules of the Kshatriya caste, and that Cakuni had won by a trick; the Kauravas had not obeyed Bhishma and Drons; they ought to be besought by sharp arrows; they could not withstand Yuyudhana, etc.  $(\beta\beta)$  (V, 3). Drupada approved of what had been said by Baladeva, except that Duryodhana should not be addressed mildly, and they ought also to send messengers to Calya, etc. (y) to collect an army; his own purchita ought to be sent to Dhrtarashtra, Duryodhana, Bhishma, and Drona (V, 4). Having approved of Drupada's words, Krehna set out for Dvaraka, and the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras began to make preparations for war, and collect troops; and Drupada despatched his purchita to the Kurus (V, 5). Drupada gave instructions to his purchita (cf. Pushya, § 554), who set out for Hastinapura with a following of disciples (V, 6). After Krshna, etc. (77) had set out for Dvaraka, Arjuna and Duryodhana come thither, while Krehna was asleep; Duryodhana sat down at the head of the bed; after him Arjuna came and stood at the back of the bed. And when Krehna awoke, he first saw Arjuna. Arjuna chose for his partner Krehna himself, who was not to fight; Daryodhana selected for himself Krshna's ten crores of Narayana cowherds. Balarama said he would fight neither for Kunti's sons nor for Duryodhana. Krtavarman gave an akshauhini to Duryodhana. Krshna promised to become Arjuna's charioteer; Arjuna came back to Yudhishthira with Krehna and the flower of the Daçarha race (V, 7).- § 555: Calya with his sons and troops (description) was advancing in order to join the Pandavas; but Duryodhana caused fine palaces of entertainment to be constructed at different spots for his reception; Calya first thought this had been arranged by Yudhishthira, until Duryodhana came forward and showed himself; then he promised Duryodhana to become the leader of his army. Calya, however, first proceeded to the Pandavas at Upaplavya, and told them about the matter. He promised Yudhishthira that when he became Karna's charioteer he would act so that Karna might be dispirited; and in order to comfort Yudhishthira he reminded him that Cakra (Indra) had to endure, together with his wife, very great misery (V, 8). At the request of Yudhishthira, Calya related the ancient story (itihasam puratanam) of the great misery endured by Indra and his queen (v. Indravijaya) (V, 9-17). So Yudhishthira should also regain his kingdom. This story of the victory of Indra, equal to the Veda, should be listened to by a king desirous of victory; he who reads it with a heart full of religious faith is purified from his sins, etc. Calya repeated his promise to damp the spirits of Karna, and went with his army to Duryodhana (V, 18). Yuyudhana, etc. (y) came to Yudhishthira with troops (description). For the Pandavas there were thus assembled seven akshauhinis of troops from various directions. In the same way king Bhagadatta (with an akshauhini crowded with Cinas and Kirātas), etc. (b) came to the Dhartarashtras. And thus Duryodhana had a force which numbered eleven akshauhinis, so that there was no room for them in the city of Hastinapura; but the Pancanada, the whole Kurujangala, etc. (e), full of abundant corn and wealth, was entirely overspread with the army of the Kauravas. And this army was beheld by the purchita who had been sent by the Pañcala king to the Kurus (V, 19).

Samçaptakavadha(h) (C. °sa°) ("the slaughter of the Samçaptakas"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 338 (i.e. Samçaptakavadhaparvan).

[Samcaptakavadhaparvan(ova)] ("the section relating to the slaughter of the Samcaptakas," the 72nd of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr.; cf. Sangaptakavadha). § 591: Drong confessed his inability to seize Yudhishthing if Arjung were by. The Trigarta king said that Arjuna had always injured them, and took an oath that either Arjung or the Trigartas should be slain. This outh was taken by the five brothers Satyaratha, etc., (a) with their 10,000 chariots, and by the Malava king, etc. ( $\beta$ ). Then they summoned Arjuna towards the southern part of the field. Arjuna told Satyant to guard Yudhishthira, and went out against the Trigarias (VII, 17). -\$592: THE TWELFTH DAY'S BATTLE. The Samcaptakas rejoiced at the prospect of fighting Arjuna, who addressed Krshna about this ill-timed joy, and terrified them with the sound of Deradatta, and attacked them. Subāhu & Arjuna; Suçarman, etc. (a) & Arjuna; they fled to Duryodhana; but urged by the Trigarta king, they once more returned to the field with the Narayana cowherds (VII, 18). Krshna conveyed Arjuna to the Samcaptakas. The Narayanas & Arjuna (+ Krshna); Arjuna blew Devadatta and employed the Tvāshtra wenpon, that confounded the foes, who began to fight each other: Ariuna crushed the Lalitthas, etc. (B), and with the Vayaeya weapon he dispersed the arrows shot by his foes, and Vayu blew away crowds of Samçaptakas with their steeds, etc. Meanwhile Drona attacked Yudhishthira (VII, 19). Drong had arrayed his troops in the shape of a garuda: Drona in the mouth; Duryodhana and his brothers = the head; Krtavarman and Krpa = the two eyes. Bhūtaçarman, etc. ( $\gamma$ ), in its neck; Bhūrigravas, etc. ( $\delta$ ), in the right wing; Vinda, etc.  $(\epsilon)$ , in the left wing before Acratthaman; in the back the Kalingas, etc. (5); in the tail Karna with his sons, etc.; Jayadratha, etc.  $(\eta)$ , in the bosom; in the midst the Pragjyotisha king. Yudhishthira disposed his troops in the shape of a semicircle. Dhrshtadyumna & Drona + Durmukha Dhartarashtra; Drona dispersed Yudhishthira's host (VII, 20). Drona & Yudhishthira + Satyajit + Vrka; Satyajit was slain by Drona; Yudhishthira fled. The Pañcalas, etc. (θ), attacked Drona, and were consumed; Çatānīka (younger brother of the Malsya king) & Drona, who slew him; the Matsyas fled. Drona defeated the Cedis, etc. (1). Yudhishthira & Drona; Çikhandin, etc. (x), & Drona; Drona slew Kshema. Yudhishthira fled away. Drona slew Pañcalya (Pāncālyanāmnā, Nīl.). Drona crushed the Pāncālas, etc. (A), and, supported by the Kurus, he vanquished Sātyaki, etc. (µ). The Pandavas fled away in all directions (VII, 21). Duryodhana addressed Karna in joy, beholding the Pañcalas, etc. (v), broken by Drona, and Bhimasena abandoned by the l'andavas and the Srinjayas. Karna said that Bhimasena, followed by Satyaki, etc. (F), would never leave the fight; Duryodhana proceeded to Drona's chariot, Samedi-Sampāti. 612 where a deafening noise was heard of Pandava warriors returning to the fight (VII, 22). At the request of Dhrtarashtra, Sanjaya described the steeds of Bhimasena, etc. (a), especially mentioning Brhanta (b); the standards of Drong, etc. ( $\pi$ ), and the bows of Yudhishthira, etc. ( $\rho$ ) (VII, 23). The despondency of Dhrtarashtra, mentioning Bhima, etc. (a) (VII, 24). When the Pandaras returned to fight and attacked Drong, the Kurus were afraid. Duryodhana urged his troops against them. Durmarshana Dhartarashtra & Bhima: Krtavarman & Ynyudhana; the Sindhu king & Kahatrararman; Subāhu & Yuyutau, who cut off the two arms of Subahu; Çalya & Yudhinhthira; Bahlika & Drupada; Vinda and Anuvinda & Virata; that encounter between the Mateyas and the Kekayas resembled that between D. and As. in days of old; Bhūtakarman Sabhūpati & Nakula's son Catanika; Bhūtakarman was slain by Catānika; Vivimçati & Sutasoma; Bhimaratha (Dhartarashtra) slew Calva; Citrasena's son & Crutakarman; Pratirindhya & Acratthaman; the son of Duhçasana & Crutakirti (the son of Arjuna by Draupadi); Lakshmana (son of Duryodhana) & Pataccarahantr; Vikarna (Dhartarashtra) & Cikhandin; Angada & Uttamanjas; Durmukha & Purujit; Karna & the five Kekaya brothers; Durjaya + Jaya + Vrjaya (Dhartarashtrah) & Nila + the Kāçi king + Jayatsena; Kshemadhārti + Brhanta & Sātyaki; the Cedi king & Ambashtha; Kypa & Vardhakshemi; Somadatta's son & Manimat; Vrshasena (the son of Karna) & Pāṇdya; Ghatotkaca & Alambusha VII, 25); Duryodhana & Bhimasena; the Anga king (Mleccha king) & do.; Bhima slew him, and his divisions fled; the Pragjyotisha king (upon his elephant Supratika) & Bhīma (who knew the anjalikāredha); Bhima escaped from the elephant, but was supposed to have been slain; Yndhishthira (+ the Pañcalas) & Bhagadatta (upon Supratika); the Daçarna king (upon his elephant) & Bhagadatta; Bhagadatta & Yuyudhāna; Bhagadatta destroyed the Pandara troops; Bhima & Bhagadatta, whose elephant frightened Bhima's steeds, that bore Bhima away; Ruciparran (Krti-sutah) & Bhagadatta, who slew him; Abhimanyu, etc. (7), & Bhagadatta's elephant; Yuyutsu had his steeds and charioteer trod down and fled; Duryodhana (?) & Abhimanyu; Arjuna, etc. (v) & Bhagadatta; the Pandara troops fled (VII, 26). Urged by Arjuna, Krshna began to proceed against Bhagadatta; the Samgaptakas (10,000 Trigartas and 4,000 Narayanah ( Vasuderasyannyah)) challenged Arjuna, and he encountered them, shot the Brahma weapon, defeated and slew them, and then turned against Bhagadatta (VII, 27); but as Suçarman with his brothers followed him from behind, he again attacked Suçarman, and then again Bhagadatta (VII, 28; Bhagadatta, at last, by means of mantras changed his hook into the Vaishnava weapon, which, received by Krshna on his breast, became a garland. As Arjuna taxed Krshna for his taking part in the battle, Krshna related the history of the Vaishnavastra (c). "The great Asura has now been dirested of that supreme weapon; now slay Bhagadatta, that enemy of the gods, even as I formerly for the benefit of the worlds slew the Asura Naraka." Arjuna then slew both Bhagadatta (who was ever the favourite and friend of Indra, v. 1302), and the elephant (VII, 29). Then Arjuna slew the two brothers Ursha [ka] and Acala (sons of the Gandhara king Subala). Dhytarashtra's sons attacked Arjuna, and Cakuni created illusions in order to confound him and Krshna: clubs, etc., and asses, etc., which Arjuna slew with celestial weapons; then darkness, whence procoeded hursh voices; this Arjuna dispelled with the weapon Jyotishka; then waves of water, dried up with the Aditya weapon; Cakuni fled. Arjuna slaughtered the Kuru army: one stream proceeded towards Drona, one towards Duryodhana; a fierce battle took place on the southern side between Arjuna and the Kurus. The various divisions of Yudhishthira's force smote the foe on every part of the field (VII, 30). Dropa + the Kurus & Yudhishthira, etc.  $(\phi)$ , + the Pāṇḍavas; Nīla & Agratthāman, who slew him; the Pāṇḍavas regretted that Arjuna was engaged in the southern part of the field in slaughtering the Samçaptakus and the Narayana force (VII, 31). Bhīmasena & Bāhlīka + Karņa; Droņa, etc.  $(\chi)$  & Bhīma; Yudhishthira despatched Nakula, etc.  $(\psi)$ , to the rescue of Bhima; Bhima, etc., & Drona; the Pandavas, etc. (w) & Drona, etc. (aa). Arjana, having slain the Samcaptakas, & Drona + the Kurus + Arjana, who employed the Agnega weapon; Dhyshtadyumna, etc. (ββ) & Karna; Ariuna slew three of Karna's brothers (77); Bhima slew fifteen of Karna's combatants; Dhyshtadyumna slew Candravarman, etc. (i?: Duryodhana, etc. (cc) & Sātyaki, rescuing Karna; Dhrshtadyumna, etc. (55) protected Sāteaki. sunset the armies retired (VII, 32 :

Samvartavata, the wind of dissolution: II, 1418 (only B.). [Samvar(t)ta-Maruttiya] ("the tale of Samvartta and Marutta"): § 778b (Acvamedh.).** Vyāsa said: In the Krta age Manu was the ruler; > Prasandhi > Kshupa > 1kshvāku > Vimca (the model bowman, the eldest of 100 brothers, all kings) > Virimca > Khaninetra(c) > Suvarcas(d)Karandhama > Avikshit (e) Karandhama > Marutta (who surpassed his father, had the strength of 10,000 elephants, and was equal to Vishnu). Desirous of performing a sacrifice, Marutta, coming to Meru, on the northern side of Himavat, caused thousands of gold vessels to be forged; there on a huge golden hill be performed the rites along with other princes (XIV, 4). Asked by Yudhishthira, Vyūsa said: As the offspring of Prajapati Daksha, D. and As., challenged each other, so did Angiras' sons Brhaspati and Samrarta; troubled by his elder brother Samvarla went naked to the woods. Indra, having vanquished the As., appointed Brh. as his priest. Formerly (read purram with B.) Angiras was the family priest of king Karandhama (see d); so also of his son Avikshit (equal to Yayati). His son Marutta used to defy Indra, and Indra used to defy Marutta, but could not prevail over him. Then Indra took the promise from Brh. that he would not perform priestly offices for Marutta ("thou hast destroyed Namuci, Vigrarapa, and Bala," said Brh.). Vaiçampāyana said: Then Indra was cured for his envy and went home (XIV, 5). Vyāsa said: The ancient tale of the discourse between Brh. and Marutta is cited in this connection. Marutta in vain tried to persuade Brh. to officiate at his sacrifice (which Brh. had himself formerly proposed); D. r. (M.-r.) Narada told him to apply to Samearta, who now, desirous of seeing Mahegrara, wandered about in Vārānasī in the garb of a madman; "having reached the gate of that city, thou must place a dead body somewhere near it, and the man who shall turn away on seeing the corpse, do thou know that man to be Samrarta; if he should ask thee to follow me," said Narada, "thou mayst even tell him without hesitation that I have ascended the pyre." Vyāsa said: "By acting thus, Marutta found Samrarta in a lonely place; Samvarta covered him with mud and ashes and phlegm and spittle. At last he sat down under a nyagrodha tree" (XIV, 6). Marutta told him the matter (also that Narada had mounted the pyre); Samvarta then, as a lunatic, scolding Marutta repeatedly with harsh words, told him to go to Brh. first (as his elder brother), and taking Brh.'s permission he might come back. As Macutta said that he had already been repulsed by Brh., and that he now desired to sacrifice even with all his goods in order to outstrip Indra, Samearta consented, if Marutta would agree to do all that Samvarta would ask him to do, as Brh. and Indra were certain to do all they could to injure Marutta. Marutta took an oath to this. Samearta said that Marutta would surpass Indra, D., and G.; he himself had no desire for wealth, but would only do what was disagreeable to Indra and Brh. (XIV, 7). Samvarta said: There is a peak Munjavat (f) on the Himālaya, where Cira is constantly engaged in austerities; go thither and appease Civa, whose names are Carra, etc. (a); then thou shalt acquire that gold. Marutta acted accordingly; Brh. became sick from envy; Indra with D. came (XIV, 8) and was told about the matter ("prosperity of a rival is always painful, and for this reason thou with D. persecutest As. and kills them "). He despatched Agni (g) to Marutta, asking him to let Brh. officiate as his priest instead of Samvarta, promising him the greatest rewards ("such as the highest regions created by Prajapati and even the whole kingdom of the gods"); Samvarta threatened to burn Agni with his fearful eye, if he ever came again on such an errand. Agni was frightened and returned to Indra and Brh. and said that Marutta had refused and did not care for his promises. Indra asked Agni to return to Marutta, and threatened him with Indra's thunderbolt if he did not obey; Agni, afraid of Samearta, suggested that the G. king should go; Indra said that nobody could burn Agni; Agni asked why then Prtra could deprive Indra of the sovereignty of Heaven; Indra, mentioning his victories over the Kālakeyas, Dā., and Prahlada, said that it was because he did not accept soma from a foc, nor strike the weak with his thunderbolt; Agni reminded him of Cyavana at Caryati's sacrifice and the creation of Mada (description): "the might of brahmans is greater than that of kshatriyas" (XIV, 9). Then Indra sent G. Dhrtarashtra on the same errand, but in vain. Vyasa said: As the clouds indicated that Indra must be near, Marutta repaired to Samvarta, who comforted him, saying that Agni would protect him, and that he would himself dispel the thunder by the winds, and granted him the boon that Indra should come in person to his sacrifice and accept the oblations offered to him, and so should all the gods. And so it happened by the power of Samvarta's incantations. Requested by Samvarta, Indra himself gave directions to all the gods to erect a hall of assembly: 1,000 well-furnished rooms with a durable staircase for the ascent of G. and Aps., and to furnish that portion of the sacrificial ground reserved for the dance of Aps., like unto the palace of Indra in heaven; Indra said that Marutta's ancestors and the gods had been highly pleased, and told him to offer a red bull to Agni, and a blue bull with a variegated skin to V.-D. Then Indra and the gods returned home. Marutta placed heaps of gold on various spots and distributed immense wealth to the brahmans.

He mentioned the eternal duties of kings; the Pandaras had not obtained their share of the paternal wealth; the murderous contrivances of the Dhartarāshtras; the deceitful game; the indignities in the council-hall; the exile for thirteen years; the Pandaras desired nothing but a peaceful settlement; the Pandaras were more powerful; men like Sātyaki, Bhīmasena.

Sañjīvana—Sañjñā. 618

and the twins were equal in might to 1,000 akshauhinis: Arjuna and Krshna nobody could fight (V, 20). Bhīshma approved of his speech; but Karna wrathfully interrupted him. Dhrtarashtra pacified Bhishma, rebuked Karna, sent Drupada's purchita back to the Pandavas, and summoned Sanjaya to the council-hall (V, 21). Dhrtardshtra gave instructions to Sanjaya, pruising the Pundavas (a) and Krshna and some of their adherents  $(\beta)$ , mentioning the killing of Cicupala (b), blaming Duryodhana and Karna, and ordered him to go to Upaplavya to salute them and the five sons of Draupadi, and tell them that Dhrtarashtra was desirous of peace with the Pandavas (V, 22). Sanjaya came to Upaplarya and saluted Yudhishthira and enquired about Bhīmasena, etc.  $(\gamma)$ . Yudhishthira inquired about Dhrtasashtra, etc. (8), and mentioned the prowess of Arjuna (c), Sahadera (d), Nakula (e), and the Ghoshayatra (V, 23). Sanjaya delivered his message and answered Yudhishthira's questions (V, 24). In the presence of the Pandavas, etc. (a), Sanjaya greeted Yudhishthira, etc. (5), and recommended peace, "for what, in sooth, is life after having killed all your kinsfolk?"; he mentioned Krshna, etc. ( $\eta$ ) on the side of the Pandavas, and Drona, etc. ( $\theta$ ), on the side of the Yudhishthira said that peace was Kauravas (V, 25). preferable to war, but complained that Duryodhana had disregarded the words of Vidura, and Dhrtarashtra had been desirous solely of satisfying his sons; that Duryodhana's counsellors were now Duhçasana, Cakuni, and Karna. He compared Arjuna, Bhima, Nakula, and Sahadeva with Karna and Duryodhana. He claimed Indrawrastha for his kingdom (V, 26). Sanjaya declared that if, without war, the Kurus would not yield his share to Yudhishthira, then it would be far better for him to live upon alms in the kingdom of the Andhakas and the Vrshnis than to obtain sovereignty by war (V, 27). Yudhishthira said that virtue and vice, which are both eternal and absolute, exchange their aspects during seasons of distress; he would not seek even what belongs to Prajūpati, or heaven, or Brahmaloka (Prajūpatyam tridivam Brahmalokam) by unrighteous means; but he would be guided by Krshna, as did Satyaki, etc. (1); Krshna was the great judge of the propriety or otherwise of all acts (V, 28). Krshna said he wished prosperity for both the Pandavas and Dhrtarashtra; therefore he desired peace; but when Dhrtarashtra and his sons were so covetous, war was inevitable; "some say that work should be shunned and that salvation is attainable by knowledge; but the brahmans know this, that though one may have a knowledge of eatable things, yet the hunger will not be appeased unless one actually eats; such branches of knowledge as are of use in doing works bear fruit, but not the other ones. In the other world it is by virtue of work that the gods, etc. ( $\kappa$ ) flourish, Yudhishthira is constantly engaged in the study of the Veda; he is bent on the horse-sacrifice and the rajasuya; he rides horses and elephants, etc.; if the Pandavas could see a course of action not involving the slaughter of the sons of Kuru, they would adopt it. But we must take into consideration the division into four castes and the respective duties allotted to each (specification). War and weapons were invented by Indra for putting the Dasyus to death." Krshna alluded to the game and the role of Cakuni there, to the indignities undergone by Krshnā from Duhçāsana and Karna, while the Kurus with Bhishma at their head did not interfere, and only Vidura took her part; and that Duhçasans had called the Pandaras cunuchs at their departure. He would go in person to the Kurus. He compared the evil passions of Duryodhana, etc. (A), with the righteousness of Yudhishthira, etc. (µ). "King Dhrtarashtra with his sons constitute a forest, while the Pandavas are its tigers; do not cut down the forest with its tigers, and let not the tigers be driven away from the forest; the tiger out of the wood is easily slain; the wood also that is without a tiger is easily cut down." Similarly the Dhartarashtras are as creepers, the Pandavas are Cala-trees, and the creepers cannot dispense with a large tree round which it can twine (V. 29). Sanjaya then bade farewell to Yudhishthira, etc. (v). Yudhishthira spoke approvingly of Sanjaya's agreeable speech and excellent conduct as an ambassador, and compared him to Vidura, and declared him to be as dear to them as Dhanañjaya (i.e. Arjuna). He recommended the brahmans to him, and told him to salute Drona, etc. (£), and the aged, middle-aged, and young ladies, "the daughters of our house," and the maidservants and manservants, and the many humpbacked and lame ones among them, and those that were defective in limb, or imbecile, and the dwarfs to whom Dhrtarashtra gave food and raiment from motives of humanity, the blind, the aged, the many that had the use only of their hands, being destitute of legs, the masterless and weak, those that vainly strived to earn a living, the ignorant, in fact, all those that were in pitiable circumstances, all the ambassadors arrived from all sides, etc. He concluded with this message to Duryodhana: "give me back my own Indraprastha (Cakrapurim), or fight with me" (V, 30). Yudhishthira said that the Creator (Dhatr) gives and takes according to his will. He told Sanjaya especially to salute Dhrtarashtra, Bhishma, and Vidura, and recommend the Pandavas to them, that they might counsel peace; and to say to Duryodhana that the Pandavas were willing to forgive his insults to Draupadi (Krshnā) and Duhçāsana's dragging her, disregarding Kunti; but they must have their proper share of the kingdom; "give us even a single province of the empire; give us even Kuçasthala (B. Avio), Vrkasthala, Mākandī, Vāraņārata, and in the fifth place any other village that thou likest; even this will end the quarrel." He said that to see the Kurus and the Pançalas live happily united was what he desired (V, 31). Having returned to Hastinapura, Sanjaya addressed I)hrtarashtra at night; he praised Yudhishthira, "who shines in his natural perfection, leaving his load of sins to be borne by thee," while Dhrtardshtra's acts were contrary to both religion and profit. In delivering the message from Yudhishthira he did not mention the alternative of giving them the five villages. He alluded to Arjuna's ascending to the very heavens and being honoured there. King Bali, not finding a primary cause (pāram), regarded time (kalah) to be the cause of everything. "To-morrow morning the Kurus, assembled together in the council-hall, will hear the words of Ajātaçatru (i.e. Yudhishthira)" (V, 32).

Whithersoever the Sarasvati was summoned, thither she made her appearance. Her seven forms are Suprabhā, etc. (a). I) Pitāmaha [i.e. Brahmán] was once performing a sacrifice at Pushkara; whatever he thought of, immediately appeared, the Gandharvas sung, the Apsarases danced. The rehis missed Sarasvati, Brahmán thought of her and she appeared there at Pushkara under the name of Suprabha. II) At Naimisha many munis were assembled, performing sacrifices and talking about the Vedas, they thought of Sarasvati, who made her appearance and came to be called Kancanakehi. MI) Similarly she came to the sacrifice of Gaya in the country of the Gayas (Gayeshu), where she flowed from the slopes of Himavat and was called Viçala. IV) At the sacrifice of Auddālaki in the northern part of Kosalā (uttars Koçalābhāgs), having been previously thought of by Uddalaka when sacrificing, she was mentally called Manorama by the rehis. V) At Kuru's sacrifice at Kurukshetra, she was summoned by Vasishtha, and named Oghavati. VI) At Daksha's sacrifice at Gangadvara she appeared under the name of Surenu (see the note of PCR. pag. 154). VII) At Brahmán's sacrifice on the Himavat, as Vimaloda. All these seven forms then came and mingled together in the tirtha, which from this is known by the name of Saptasarasvata. austerities afflicted Indra with fear. As he could not be turned away even by diverse kinds of rewards, Indra despatched to him the Apsaras Alambusha on the banks of the Sarasvati. At the sight of her his seed fell into the Sarasrati, the river held it in her womb and brought forth a son whom she brought to the rehis, who granted her a boon, saying that the Vicvaderas, the rshis, the Gandharras, and the Apsarases would henceforth derive great happiness when oblations of her water were presented to them, and praised her as having sprung from the lake of Brahmán, etc., and said that the child should be named S., and during a drought of twelve years teach the Vedus to many brahmans, and that she should become the foremost of all sucred rivers. The river took the child with her. Meanwhile, on the occasion of a war between the gods and the Danaras, Indra wandered through the three worlds in search of weapons, but failed to find such weapons as were fit to slay the enemics of the gods, until Dadhīca (hh), solicited by the gods, gave up his life (and obtained many regions of inexhaustible merit) and Indra from his bones caused many kinds of weapons (thunderbolts, discs, maces, clubs, and bludgeons) to be made. With the thunderbolt born of Brahma energy and inspired with mantras, Indra made a loud noise when he hurled it and slow ninety-nine heroes among the After a long time a twelve years' drought Dailyas. occurred, and the rshis fled away; only S. was retained by the Sarasvati, who supplied him with food, giving him large fishes, and he offered oblations to the rehis and the gods. [Satyavatīlābhopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating how Cantanu got Satyavati"). § 165 (cf. Apavop.): Description of Cantanu, the princes anointed him as "King of Kings" (rajarajyē, v. 3974); he ruled the earth from Hastinapura, the town (putabhedana) of the Kurus (v. 3978); there was no killing of deer, boars, etc., under his reign (cf. § 162!) except for the sacrifices to the gods, rshis, and pitre. For thirty-six years he, without enjoying the love of women, roamed about in the woods, and his son, Gangeya Devavrata, the Vasu, was equal to him. One day, when pursuing a deer he had wounded along the banks of the Ganga, he saw a vouth who, with a heavenly weapon, checked the flow of the Ganga. It was his son who, knowing him, but not known by him, and clouding his perception by illusion (māyā), suddenly disappeared. On Cantanu's prayer, Gangā appeared holding the boy, and having told him that he was his son, and that he had studied all the Vedas and their Angas with Vasishtha and knew all castras that were known by Uçanas and Brhaspati (adored by the gods and Asuras), and by the rshi Rama Jamadagnya, and also the rajadharmas, she let him take him to his capital, where he was installed as heir-apparent. After four years Cantanu met with Satyavali in the wood on the banks of Yamuna, and demanded her hand from her father, the king of the fishermon (daçarāja), who would not consent unless Cantanu would promise that his son by Satyarati should become his successor on the throne. Cantanu would not grant the boon, but returned to Hastinapura und passed his time in sorrow until Decarrata, having learned from the old minister the cause of his grief, by declaring that he would adopt the vow of brahmacarya (including celibacy), prevailed upon the fisherman (who had formerly rejected the Devarshi Asita, because Paraçara had pointed out to him Cantanu as a suitable husband for her), that he gave Satyavati to Cantanu, while the gods and rehie showered flowers upon Devavrata, calling him Bhishma. Bhishma then took the maiden to Hastinapura on his chariot. and Cantanu bestowed upon him the boon of death at choice (I. 100). (For continuation v. Citrangadop.)

Saubhavadhākhyāna ("the story of the destruction of Saubha"). § 71 (Parvasaugr.): I, 2, 428 (i.e. Saubhavadhopākhyāna).

[Saubhavadhopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to the destruction of Saubha"; cf. Saubhavadhākhyāna). § 319 (cf. Arjunabh.). Kyshna related: When Cicupala, the son of Damaghosha, had been slain, his brother, the Marttikatata-king Calva, in order to avenge him, came to Draraka in the Saubha, who moved at will and slew many of the Vrshnis, and sought for Krshna desiring to kill him. Krshna was in Indraprastha at the rajasaya of Yudhishthira, and when he learnt this on returning home, he set out to slay him, and found him in an island in the ocean (see Nil. and PCR.; BR. "a bay"), and blowing his conch Pancajanya, slew numerous Danaras. Then, as soon as he heard of the game at dice, he had come to the Pandavas (III, 14) - § 320. Copious description of the combats with Calva: When Calva attacked Drārakā it was well furnished and strongly fortified (description of fortifications and measures taken to defend the city by Ugrasena, Uddhara, etc.) and defended by Gada, Camba, etc. (III, 15). Carudeshna (son of Krshna and Rukmini), Camba (son of Krshna and Jambavati), and Pradyumna (son of Krshna and Rukmini) rushed out against him. They on both sides fought by means of inaya. Camba put Kshemarrddhi, the commander of Calra's troops, to flight by a shower of arrows, and slew a Daitoya named Vegarat with his mace. Carndeshna slew the Danava Vivindhya with a consecrated Then Calva, riding on Saubha, encountered Pradyumna (III, 16). Riding on his chariot with a gaping makara in its standard, Pradyumna with showers of arrows slew the Danacas and pierced the heart of Calra so that he fell in a swoon, but he rose again and wounded Pradyumna about his throat so that he became senseless (III, 17). Pradyumna's charioteer Dāruki, a sūta, carried him off the field by the help of his fleet steeds, but when Pradyumna had regained his senses, he ordered him to turn the chariot, reminding him of the customs of the Frshnis in buttle, and saying that he had restrained Krtavarman, the son of Urdika, from sallying out, as he would himself resist Çālva (III, 18). As Çalva used his maya of the Asuras, Pradyumna shot him down with the Brahmastra, and was about to aim another arrow at him, capable of killing any person, when all the hosts of the gods, with Indra and Dhaneçvara (i.e. Kubera), sent Narada and Crasana (i.e. the Wind), who ordered him to desist as the creator (Dhatr) had destined Krshna, the son of Devaki, to slay him. Calva then mounted Saubha and went away through the skies leaving Draraka (III, 19). When Calva had left Draraka, Krshna returned from the rājasūya, and found Drārakā deprived of its splendour, etc.

He learnt from Mardikya (i.e Krtavarman) about the invasion of Calra, committed the city to the charge of king Ahuka and Anakadundubhi (i.e. Vasudeva), etc., bowed to Bhara (i.e. Civa), and set out on his chariot yoked with Caibya and Sugriva and with Daruka for his charioteer, blowing the Pañoajanya, till he arrived at Marttikarata, and pursued Calva (Daiteyāpasadah, v. 796), who, stuying in Saubha, remained in the sky above the midst of the ocean a kroca off, so that Arshna's soldiers could not see it, but were obliged to stand as mere spectators. After a long battle with arrows, in which Krahna killed numerous Danaras, they took to fight by means of illusion, whirling maces, ploughshares, etc., and then mountain peaks. As none could ascertain whether it was day or night, or distinguish the points of the horizon, Krshna, becoming be wildered, made use of the Prajudstra, by which he regained light (III, 20). Dāruka was covered all over with shafts. Then a messenger of Ahuka came from Dearaka, saying that Calva had come to Draraka and had slain Krshna thought that then Satyaki, Baladera, Pradyumna, Carudeshna, Camba, etc., must necessarily have been killed first. Now he saw Vasudeva falling from Saubha, and swooned away; but, as he, after regaining consciousness, saw neither Saubha, nor Calva, nor Vasudera, he concluded that it was illusion (III, 21). Though Krshna could not see Saubha, which had vanished through illusion, he discharged many arrows from the Caringa. The Danaras set up a loud howl, and when Arshna, making use of a weapon that pierced the foe following the sound, killed them at one place, the yell ceased at that place and started from another quarter. Then Saubha reappeared at Pragjyotisha. Krshna, Daruka, and the horses were covered by torrents of rocks that concealed them, and the Irshnis fled in all directions. Krshna then destroyed the crags with Indra's thunderbolt, Daruka pointed at Calva and exhorted Krshna to slay him. Krshna made use of his Agneya weapon and hurled his discus Sudarçana (b) against the city of Saubha, that fell cut in twain like the city of Tripura by the shafts of Mahecrara. Then the discus came back into his hands and was hurled against Calra and cut him in twain. The remaining Danavas fled in fear. Krshna returned to the Anarttas. It was for this reason that he could not come to Hastinapura and prevent the gambling.- § 321: Then Krshna took leave of Yudhishthira, etc., and set out for Draraka in his chariot yoked with Caibya and Sugriva, taking with him Subhadra and Abhimanyu. Then Dhrshtadyumna set out for his own city, taking with him the Draupadeyas. And the Cedi king, Dhrshtaketu (Cicupala's son, Nil.), set out for his beautiful city of Cuktimati, taking with him his sister [ Karenumati, the wife of Nakula; Nil., v. I. 3831]. Also the Kaikeyas (B. Kekayah; Sahadevaçyalah, Nil.) went away. But the brahmans, raiçyas, and inhabitants of the country would not leave the Pandavas. Yudhishthira in due time ordered his men to make the chariots ready (111, 22). (For continuation v. Dvaitavanaprav.).

Hanumat asked him not to tell anyone that he dwelt there; this was the time of the arrival of the gods and of the Gandharvas (cf. v. 11220); he declared himself willing if Bhima might wish it to go to Hastinapura and slay the Dhartarashtras. etc., and dive into the army of his foes, giving leonine roars and remaining on the flagstuff of Arjuna's chariot. Then Hanumat vanished (III, 151).- § 432: Description of the proceeding of Bhima along the Gandhamadana till he found the lotuses (III, 152). Description of the lotus-lake, near Kailūsa, guarded by hundreds of thousands of Rūkshasas (called Krodhavaçah), sprung from a cascade near the abodo of Kubera, the sporting place of Kubera, frequented by Gandharvas, Apsarases, gods, divine rehis, Yakshas, Kimpurushas, Rākshasas, and Kinnaras. Bhīma drank of the water (III. 153). The Krodhavaças ordered Bhima to ask the permission of Kuhera before he entered the lake: but Bhima plunged into the water, and as the Rakshasas attacked him, he slew 100 of them with his mace, inlaid with golden plates, and then drank of the water, by which his strength was fully restored, and gathered saugandhika-lotuses, while the Krodhavaças fled through the sky to the peaks of Kailasa and gave account to Kubera, who said: "Let Bhima take as many lotuses as he likes." The Rakshasas then returned to Bhīma (III, 154).—§ 433: As there arose a violent wind with gravel, meteors, thunder, darkness, earthquake, dust. and evil omens, Yudhishthira, having learned from Krshnā the depart of Bhima, and alleging that Bhima had not formerly done any wrong to the Siddhae (siddhanam brahmavādinām, v. 11415), resolved to find out Bhīma and let Ghatotkaca carry Krshnā, while other Rākshasas carried the Pandavas and the brahmans, and so they proceeded with Lomaça to the lake, where the slaughtered Yakshas were lying, and Yudhishthira entreated Bhima never again to offend the gods; the Pandavas began to sport in the lake, and the warders (i.e. the Rākshasas), with rocks for weapons. bowed down in humility. There they dwelt for a short time on the slopes of Gandhamadana, expecting Arjuna (III, 155). - $ 434: One day when Yudhishthira, remembering the tīrthas, rivers (Ilā, etc.), etc., that they had visited, consulted with Bhima how they should repair to the abode of Vaicravana (b), a voice from the sky said that they must first return to Badari and thence to the hermitage of Vrshaparvan (c) and that of Arshtishena. There came a shower of blossoms. According to the counsel of Dhaumya, they all returned to the hermitage of Nara and Narayana (III, 156).

Hearing the shouts in the Pandava camp, they proceeded farther and reached a dense forest. Dhrtarashtra interrupted Saniava by expressing his grief for Duryodhana, and then inquired about the acts of the three survivors (a). Sanjaya continued: Açvatthaman, etc., laid themselves down for rest under a huge banyan; Krpa and Krtavarman fell asleep;

Accept haman was kept awake by wrath and the desire of vengeance. He saw a fierce owl coming to that bunyan and slaving a large number of crows roosting on its branches; at this sight he formed the resolution of slaying the Pandava army while buried in sleep; he roused Krpa and Krtavarman, unfolded his project before them, and asked for their advice (X, 1); Krpa dissuaded him from executing his wicked design: "Let us repair to Dhrtarashtra, Gandhari, and Vidura, and ask them as to what we should do" (X, 2); Accepthaman tried to refute Krpa's arguments (B) (X, 3). Krpa promised to aid Acvatthaman if the latter would fight the for the next morning during daylight (7); Acratthaman's answer: he would not desist ( $\delta$ ) (X, 4). Krpa earnestly remonstrated with Acratthaman, who declared his resolution to be unaltered (e), yoked his steeds to his chariot, and proceeded alone, saying that he would avenge his father (1); Krpa and Krtavarman followed him. Approaching the Pandava camp, Acratthaman stopped at the gate (X, 5). He beheld a being of gigantic frame (description; hundreds and thousands of Hrshikeças issued from its flames) ready to resist him, and fearlessly fought it; it devoured all the weapons of Acratthaman, who repented of his rash deed, and resolved to seek the protection of Mahadeva (X, 6), to whom he recited a hymn (7). A golden altar appeared before him with a blazing fire on it; many mighty beings of extraordinary appearance came there (description), worshippers of Mahadeva. Açvatthaman felt no fear at the sight; he offered himself to Mahadeva as a libation on the fire: Mahadeva appeared and declared that the period of life of everybody in the camp had run out; he gave a sword to Acratthaman and filled him with his own energy; many invisible beings and Rā. proceeded to his right and left as he set out (X, 7). He asked Krpa and Krtavarman to stand at the gate and slay everybody who would seek to escape; he entered the Pandava camp like a thief and slew Dhrshtadyumna, etc. (0) (description; he employed the Rudra weapon); Ra. uttered loud roars in joy; also Y. came there; Krpa and Krtavarman set fire to the Pandava camp in three places; "Arjuna is incapable of being vanquished by D., As., G., Y., and Ra." Before midnight the vast host of the Pandavas was slain by Acratthaman; the camp was invaded by Ra. and Pc. that gorge upon blood and flesh. Acvatthaman forgot his grief for his father; when morning dawned he issued from the camp and joined Krpa and Krtavarman. Dhrtarashtra asked why Acvatthaman did not achieve such a feat before; Sanjaya answered that the absence of the Pandavas with Krshna, as also the sleep, was the cause of Açvatthaman's success. They congratulated each other and resolved to give notice of the slaughter to Duryodhana (X, 8). They beheld Duryodhana still living, surrounded by wolves, hyenas, etc. They lamented and informed him (1); Acvatthaman asked him, when he came to heaven, to inform Drong and embrace Bahlika, etc. (x), and informed him who were yet alive ( $\lambda$ ) and who had been slain (u). Duryodhana regained his senses and praised Acvatthaman, etc. (v). Saying "we shall all meet again in heaven", he gave up his life-breaths; his soul ascended to heaven. At early duwn Sanjaya came to the city and lost his spiritual sight. Acvatthaman, etc., ascended their chariots. Dhytarashtra broathed long and hot sighs (X, 9).

Setubandhana(m) ("the building of the bridge"). § 535 (cf. Rāmopākhyānap.): The monkoy chiefs (a) began to flock together to Rāma and Sugrīva on Mālyavat. On a lucky day the army set out. Hanāmat was in the van, Lakshmaņa in the rear, the army was protected by Nala, etc. (3).

Arriving at the shore of the milky ocean (kehirodam . . . adgaram, v. 16289). Rama thought of means of crossing it. He and Lakshmana lay down on the seashore, the Ocean appeared to him in a vision and said: "I also have sprung from the race of Ikshvaku; the monkey Nala is a son of Tvashtr, whatever he will throw into my waters I will support." Nala then built a bridge, which to this day is known as Nalasetu. At this time Vibhīshana with four of his counsellors came to Rama. Sugrica suspected him to be a spy, but Rama installed him in the sovereignty of all the Rakshasas and made him his own counsellor and the friend of Lakshmana. It was under the guidance of Vibhishana that the army crossed the bridge in a month. Rama then caused the gardens of Lanka to be devastated by his monkeys. Rarana's counsellors Cuka and Sarana came as spies and were seized by Vibhishana, but dismissed by Rama. Rama then sent Angada as his envoy to Ravana (III, 283).

Sītāharaṇa(m) ("the carrying away of Sītā"). § 529 (cf. Itāmopākhyānap.). Rāvaṇa caused Mārīca to entice away Rāma by assuming the shape of a deer with golden horns and a golden skin. Seeing this deer Rāma pursued it, like Rudra pursuing the stellar deer (tārāmrgaṃ) in days of yore; struck with Rāma's arrow Mārīca, imitating Rāma's voice cried out, calling upon Sītā and Lakkhmaṇa. Lakkhmaṇa, thinking that nobody was able to slay Rāma, at first inclined to stay there and protect Sītā, but as she suspected him, he set out on the track of Rāma. Then Rāvaṇa, in the guise of an ascetic, with shaven head and with a kuṇḍala and a triple staff, came to the hermitage and began to carry away Sītā to Lankā; on his way he was seen by the vulture Jaṭāyu (III, 278).

(Karttikeya, (langeya), who was seen by the Krttikah, and having assumed six mouths, sucked them all. Himavat was transformed into gold, and from this reason mountains became producers of gold. Lying on that golden clump of reeds he was praised by G., etc. Gaigā waited upon him, and Earth held him; the celestial priest Brhaspali performed the usual rites (jātakarmādikāh kriyāh); the Veda in a fourfold form (caturmurtih) and the fourfold (catushpadah) Dhanurveda and all weapons (castragramah sasangrahah) approached him. One day he saw Çiva and Uma amid a swarm of ghastly creatures (description). Also the seven Matrs were present there, and S., V.-D., M., V., P., R., A., Si., Serpents, Da., the birds, Brahman with his two sons, and Vishnu and Indra, and D.-G. headed by Narada and D.-r., and Si. headed by Brhaspati, and the fathers of the universe who are the gods of even the gods, and the Yamas and Dhamas. Civa, Uma, Ganga, and Agni each thought: "he will come to me." therefore he by his yoga power assumed four forms; Skanda went to Rudra, Viçakha to Uma, Cakha (which is his Vayuform) to Agni, Naigameya to Ganga. D., Da., and Ra. made a loud noise. Rudra, Umā, Agni, and Gangā prevailed upon Brahmán, who had formerly given away the sovereignties of D., G., Ra., Bh., Y., birds, and Pn., that he gave him the state of a generalissimo (saināpatya) among all creatures; and Bruhmún ordered the kings of the hosts of the gods to wait upon him. Then the gods headed by Brahman, taking Skanda with them, came together to Himavat for his instalment on the bank of the Sarasvati (punyam Haimaratim devim), which at Samantapañcaka is celebrated over the three worlds; there D. and G. cheerfully took their seats (IX. 44). Collecting all articles for the investiture according to the scriptures, Brhaspati duly poured libations into the fire; Himavat gave a seat adorned with gems, on which Karttikeya 641 Skanda.

was scated; Indra, etc. (7) there came together; Brahmán, Kacyapa, etc., poured water from the Sersevall upon Skanda. even as the gods had poured water on the head of Varuna, the lord of the waters, in order to invest him with sovereignty. Brahmán gave to Skanda four mighty companions (mahāpārishadan) with speed like the wind, and crowned with ascetic success (siddhan): Nandisena, Lohitakeha, Ghantakarna, and Kumudamālin. Sthāņu gave to Skanda a mighty companion (pārishadam) capable of producing 100 illusions, and who, in the great battle between the gods and the Asuras, slew with his hands alone 14 millions (prayutani caturdaça). Then the gods made over to Skanda an army consisting of Nairrtas of a form like that of Vishnu. Then D. with I., G., Y., Ra., Mu. and P. shouted "victory" (jayaçabdam). Then Yama gave him two companions (anucarau), both of whom resembled Death (read Yamah Kalopamau with C., B. has Yama-Kulopamau): Unmatha and Pramatha. Sarya gave him two of his followers, Subhrāja and Bhāsvara; Soma gave him two companions (anucarau): Mani and Sumani, both like summits of Kailasa, with white garlands and white unguents. Agni gave to his son (i.e. Skanda) the heroic Jealajihea and Jyotis. Amça gave him five companions: Parigha, etc. (8). Indra gave him two companions: Utkroca and Pancaka, armed with thunderbolt and club respectively, and who had in battle slain innumerable enemies of India. Vishnu gave him three companions: Cakra, etc. (e). The Acres gave him Vardhana and Nandana, who had mastered all the sciences. Dhatr gave him five companions: Kunda, etc. (3). Trashtr gave him Cakra and Anucakra, both capable of producing illusions (mahāmāyau), etc. Mitra gave him Suvrata and Satyasandha of great learning and ascetic merits (tapovidyadharau), and capable of granting boons. Vidhatr gave him Suprabha and Cubhakarman. Pushan gave him two companions (parshadau): Panitaka and Kalika, with great powers of illusion (mahamayavinau). Vayu gave him Bala and Atibala, with great mouths. . Varuna gave him Yama and Atiyama (PCR.: Ghasa and Atighasa), with mouths like that of the timi. Himavat gave him Surarcas and Ativarcas. Meru gave him Kancana and Meghamalin, Manu gave him Sthira and Atisthira. Vindhya gave him Ucchriga and Aticringa (PCR.: Ucchrita and Agnicringa) who fought with large stones. Samudra (the ocean) gave him Sangraha and Vigraha, armed with maces. Parvatt gave him Unmada, Cankukarna, and Pushpadanta. Vasuki gave him the snakes Jaya and Mahājaya. Similarly S., R., V., P., etc. gave commanders of forces armed with lances, etc. Moreover, there were several other combatants: Cankukarna, etc. (7). Besides, Brahmin gave him thousands upon thousands of mighty companions, devoted to ascetic austerities and regardful of brahmans, of different ages and with different kinds of faces (extremely fanciful description; the faces of some resembled that of Garuda, etc.), they spoke various kinds of languages (nanabhashah; kuçala deçabhashasu) (IX, 45). Also the large bands of the Mothers (Mairganan), those slayers of foes, by whom the universe is pervaded, became the companions of Kumdra; the names of the Matre are: Prabhāvatī, etc. (θ) (description), some of them partook of the nature of Yama, some of that of Rudra, etc. (1); they were beautiful like Aps., in voice they resembled the kokila, in prosperity Kubera, in battle their energy resembled that of Indra, etc., they have their abodes on trees and open spots and crossings of four roads, also in caves, crematoriums, mountains, and springs; they speak different languages.

Indra gave to Guha (i.e. Skanda) a dart for the destruction of the enemies of the gods (description), and a banner. Civa gave him a large army named Dhananjaya, protected by 30,000 warriors equal to Rudra himself. Vishnu gave him a triumphal gurland that enhanced the power of the wearer. Uma gave him two pieces of cloth, of effulgence like that of the sun. Ganga a celestial waterpot produced from amrta. Garuda gave him his Invourite son Citrabarhin, a peacock. Aruna gave a cock of sharp talons. Varuna gave a snake of great energy. Brahman gave him, as devoted to the Brahman (brahmanyaya), a black deerskin and (Lokabharanah, presumably = Brahmán) victory in all battles. (Description of Skanda's army.) The gods with Indra praised Kumara. The D-G. sung, and Aps. danced. Skanda granted a boon to all the gods, saying: "I shall slay all your foes." He then, with that vast host, set out for the destruction of the Dailyas, having Exertion (Vyavasaya), etc. (x) in the van. All Dai., Ra., and Da. fled, pursued by the gods. Millions of darts issued from Skanda's dart. He at last slew Taraka (the chief of the Daityas), etc.  $(\lambda)$ ; the foes were consumed with flames, produced by Skanda; many were killed by his roars alone, etc. (description). Bali's son, the Daileya Bana, took shelter within the Kraunea mountain (named after its sound, resembling the cry of a kraunea bird) which Karttikeva (i.e. Skanda) pierced with that dart given to him by Agni (! v. the note of PCR., page 186) (description); Vd. soared into the air; K. became very anxious; Dai. came out and were slain together with that son of the Daitya chief and his younger brother. Repeatedly hurled from Skanda's hand, the durt repeatedly came back to him. The gods, G. and M-r (yajvānak) honoured Skanda (yoginām içvaram), the celestial ladies showered plenty of flowers upon him. Some speak of him as Sanatkumara (the eldest son of Brahman), some as the son of Mahecvara, and some as that of Agni, or of Uma, or of the Krttikus, or of Ganga. That tirtha on the Sarasvati then became a second heaven; staying there Skanda gave to everybody various kinds of dominion and bestowed the three worlds on the foremost of the Nairrian (Nairrianukhyebhyah, so both B. and C.; "the foremost ones of the celestials," PCR.): IX, 44, 2488; 45, 2528, 2537, 2539, 2540, 2542, 2557 (°sya sainikāh), 2617 (°syanucarāh); 46, 2671, 2686, 2688, 2697.—§ 615 (Baladevatirthayātrā): IX, 46, 2724, 2727 (abhishiktah, all. to § 615u).- § 619 (Strīvilāpap.): XI, 23, 652 (coto . . . Skanda = Sūrya (the Sun): III, 148.—Do. = Çiva (1000 names). Do. = Vishņu (1000 names).

Skanda (XIII, 2013), v. Skanda '.

[Skanda-Qakra-samagama(h)] ("meeting of Skanda with Indra").—§ 499 (cf. Skandotp.). The planets (grahds) and upagrahas (see BR.), Matrs and the ganas of the parisheds preceded by Fire and other terrible gods waited on Skanda. Indra, with the hosts of the gods approached, mounted on Airdvata, in order to kill him. But Skanda defeated them by flames, and when Indra pierced his right side with his thundorbolt, thence sprang forth an armed youth Viçakha (vajra-viçanād jāto, v. 14384), and Indra and the gods sought and obtained the protection of Skanda (III, 227).

Skandadhara = Vishnu (1000 names).

Skandamātr ("the mother of Skanda") = Durgā (Umā): VI. 803.

Skandāpasmara, name of a demon. § 502 (Manushyagrahak.): III, 230, 14479.

Skandarāja = Skanda: XII, 12327 (C. has Skandha).

Skandaviçākha = Çiva: XIII, 907 (C. hus Skandha°).

[Skandayuddha(m)] ("the combat of Skanda"). § 503 (cf. Manushyagr.). Then Braha, the daughter of Daksha, who had in vain loved Agni from her childhood, prevailed upon Skanda that she should live for ever with Agni. in so far as offerings with mantras to the gods and pites (havyan kavyañ ca) should always be coupled with the name of Scahā. -§ 504. Then Skanda was sent by Brahman to his futher Rudra: for Rudra and Uma had entered Agni and Svaha, and from this combination Skanda had sprung; Rudra's semen had been thrown back upon the hill, whence sprang forth Minjika and Minjika, and portions of it fell into the Blood Sex, into the rays of the sun, upon the earth, and upon the trees, whence sprang forth the various troops of his parishadas, living on flesh. These five classes of spirits should be honoured with sun-flowers (arkapushpaih: Culotropis giganten) for the sake of wealth and healing of diseases; Minjika and Minjika must be honoured for the welfare of children; the females, named Vrddhikas, who were produced in the trees and live on human flesh, must be worshipped by persons who desire to have children. These are the innumerable ganas of Piçacas.—§ 505. Airasata had two bells named Varjayanti; Indra gave one of them to Vicakha and the other one to Skanda; the standards of Skanda and Viçükha were red. Skanda, surrounded by troops of Piçaeas and gods, sat on the golden mountain with the toys that had been given to him by the gods. Description of the Crets mountain .-§ 506. Then Civa, with Pareatt, rode in their shining chariot, voked with 1,000 lions and managed by Kals, to Bhadravata; they were preceded by Kubera (riding in Pushpaka) with the Guhyakas, and followed by Indra (riding on Airarata) and the gods; in the right wing of his army was the great Yaksha Amogha, with the Jrmbhakas, Yakshas, Rakshases, Vasus, Rudras, etc.; there was also Yama, with Mrtyu, surrounded by hundreds of terrible diseases; behind Yama the trident of Civa, named Vijaya, surrounded by Varuna, with various aquatic animals; the pattice of Rudra surrounded by clubs, etc., and followed by the umbrells of Rudra, and after this the water-vessel, worshipped by the troops and maharshis, and on the right side of this the sceptre (dandah), with Bhrgus, Angirases, and gods. Behind these rode Rudra in his white charlot, followed by rivers, etc. ; Apearases, nakshatras, planets, the children of the gods, etc., and Parjanya. Some held a white umbrella over his head, and Agni and Vayu held the two fans. Behind him came Indra and the rejerchie, and Gauri, Vidya, etc., and the sciences (vidyaganah). In the front the Rakshasa graha advanced, holding the standard. The foremost of Yakshas, Pingala, the friend of Rudra, who is always busy in places where corpses are burned, at one time was ahead of the army and at another behind it. Rudra is worshipped by mortals with virtuous actions in various forms. At the request of Cive. Skande took the command of the seventh army corps (skandhasua) and was advised always to look up to Civa. then he should attain great welfare .- § 507. Omens frightened Civa, Parcatt, the gods, and the Danavas (Asuras, Dailyas); Indra encouraged the gods when about to flee; the Danava Mahisha crushed 10,000 of the gods with a mountain, put Indra and the gods to flight, and seized the pole of Rudra's chariot, while heaven and carth grouned, etc., and the maharshis lost their senses, but (as Rudra did not choose to kill him himself) Skanda killed him, cutting off his head that barred the entrance of sixteen yojanas [to the Uttara-Kurus, Nil. ], though the Ultara-Kurus at present pass easily by that gate. The Danaras fell in large numbers from the lance and arrows of Skanda; the lance always returned to his hand again after killing thousands of enemics; the parishadas of Ekanda devoured them and drunk their blood. When the Danavas were defeated, Skanda went to Civa and was embraced and praised by Indra, Thon Indra, with the gods, took leave from Cira and left the place, and Rudra returned to Bhadravata, after having recommended to the gods to render allegiance to Skanda just as to himself. In one day Skanda had killed the Danaras and conquered the three worlds. (ch. 231).

Skandāksha, a warrior of Skanda. § 616u (Skanda): IX, 457, 2562.

Skandha, a serpent. § 67 (Sarpasattra): I, 57, 2160 (only B., C. has Maniskandhah instead of Manis Skandhah).

Skandharāja, v. Skanderāja.

Skandhavicakha, v. Skandavicakha.

[Skandopakhyana(m)] ("opisode of Skanda").- § 500 (of. Skauda-Çakra-samāg.). The Parishadas of Skanda: When Skanda was struck with the thunderbolt, a number of male children were produced, who steal little children, whether born or in the womb, as also a number of female children. They adopted Viçakha as their father. Bhadiaçakha (form of Skanda, cf. v. 14400), with a face like that of a goat, in the battle protected his sons and daughters, in the presence of the mothers. Therefore they call Skanda Kumurapitr (so B., C. has Kumuram pilaram), and those who desire to have sons worship Rudra as Agni, and Uma as ·Svaha (so C., B. hus Agnimukham instead of Agnim Umam). The daughters of the Tapa fire obtained from Skanda that they became the mothers of the whole world; some of them should be good (cirdh) and some evil (acirah). Having adopted Skands as their son, the host of the mothers departed. Kaki, Halima, etc. (in all seven) (a) had, by the grace of Skanda, a terrible son Cicu, who is named virashiaka (i.e. consisting of eight men) or, when the goat's head is included, naraka (i.e. consisting of nine). The sixth face of Skanda is that of a goat, the best of the six, honoured by the mothers, that by which Bhadracakha creuted the divine energy (? çaktim yenderjad divyam). This happened on the fifth day of the bright half of the month, and on the sixth a terrific battle took place (III, 228) .- § 501. Description of Skanda. Cri, embodied and looking like a lotus, rendered her allegiance to him. The brahmens and maharshis praised him, saying: "Hiranyagardha! thou who wast born only six nights ago, do thou become Indra." and at his request they explained to him the offices of Indra (b). Even Indra besought him to become the lord of the gods. But, at the request of Skanda, Indra retained his sovereignty, and, with all the gods, anointed Skanda as the leader of the celestial forces, and fastened the colestial wreath of gold, of Vicrakarman's manufacture, round his neck. Rudra came with Parratt and honoured him. Skanda is called the son of Rudra because Agni is called Rudra by brahmans, and because he was produced by Rudra entering Fire, and because he was honoured by Rudra before all the gods, and because the Cveta mountain, where he was reared by the Krttikas, was formed of Rudra's semen virile. The red cock, given him by Agni, formed the ensign of Skanda, perched on the top of his chariot. The power (cakti) which conduces to the victory of the gods, advanced before him. An innute armour entered into his body, and always manifests itself on the battle-field. Under the recitation of holy texts he was honoured by D., G., Aps., Pc., etc. Then he married Decasena (names v. 14451), Brh. performing the necessary prayers and oblations. Then Lakshmi began to serve him. Therefore the fifth lunar day is called Cri-pancami, and the sixth "a great tithi" (mahatithih) (III, 229).

[Skandotpatti(h)] ("origin of Skanda").-§ 495 (Märk.). Markandeya promised to tell the story of Karttikeya, the son of Adbhuta, begotten of the wives of the Brahmarshis. Formerly, when the Asuras always defeated the gods, Indra. anxious to find out a leader for the celestial host, repaired to the Manasa mountain, and, hearing a woman crying for protection, rescued her from the Asura Keçin, whom he wounded and put to flight (III, 223). She told Indra that she was Devasena, daughter of Prajapati, and that her sister Daity as end had let herself be taken away by Krein from the Manasa mountain, where they used to sport with their female friends with the permission of Prajapati. Indra said that she was a sister's daughter of his mother Dakshayani. She asked Indra to select a husband for her, who was able to conquer the gods, Danavas, Yakshas, Kinnaras, Uragas, Rakshas, and Daityas. Indra was grieved, thinking there was no such husband for her.- § 496. Then Indra perceived the Sun rising from the Udaya hill, and Soma (the Moon) entering the Sun on the amavasya (new-moon day) at the Raudra muhurta. and the gods and Asuras fighting on the Udaya mountain, the morning twilight tinged with red clouds, the Sea bloodred: Bhraus and Angirases offered oblations, and Agni took the oblations and entered the Sun, whilst the Sun was entering the twenty-fourth parvan, and Sindhu was flowing with a current of fresh blood, etc. Indra thought that, if now Some or Agni gave birth to a son, this son might become the husband of Devasena. Then he repaired with Devasena to the world of Brahmán, who promised that it should be as Indra had thought. Then Indra, with Devasena, repaired to the place where the devarables Vasishtha, etc. lived, and the gods also came thither to drink soma and receive their shares of offerings, and the Adbhuta fire came from the solar disc to the ahavaniya and made over the offerings to the gods. He, (Adbhuta), then saw the wives of the rehis sleeping in their acramae and fell in love. In order to look at them daily, he entered the garhapatya fire, and dwelt there for a long time, and at last, from despair, repaired to a forest in order to do away with himself. Svaha, daughter of Daksha, who had in vain loved Adbhuta, now resolved upon assuming the guise of the wives of the seven rehis (III, 224). Svaha first gratified her desire in the guise of Civa, the wife of Angiras, and then, lest somebody should unduly suspect the brahmana ladies, she went out of the forest in the guise of a bird (garuff, superal), and on the Crete mountain, that was covered with clumps of reeds and guarded with seven-headed poisonous serpents, rūkshasas, Piçūcas, etc., she threw the semen, which she held in her hand, into a golden basin. Then, assuming successively the form of five of the others, she did the same on the first lunar day (pratipadi). Only the form of Arundhati she was unable to assume because of her ascetic merit and devotion to her husband. The semen produced a child, whom the rehie called Skanda (etymology v. 14315), with six heads, etc. On the second day it first assumed a form, on the 3rd it looked like e little child, on the fourth the limbs were developed. Seizing the bow used by the destroyer of Tripura, Skanda uttered a terrible roar, so that the great nagas Citra and Airavata sprang up. But Skanda seized them with two of his hands, and holding a dart in one hand, a cock in another, etc., and blowing a conch-shell, he terrified-the creatures with his roars. The persons of various orders, who then sought the protection of Skanda, are called his followers by the brahmans (parishadan brahmanan, read brahmanah). Discharging his arrows in the direction of the Costa mountain, he rent asunder the mountain Kraunca, the son of Himavat; therefore the swans and vultures go to the mountain Meru. The other mountains also screamed aloud. Then, with his lance, he rent in twain one of the peaks of the Cveta mountain. Mount Cveta and the other mountains left the Earth and fled; the Earth was torn asunder on all sides; she went to Skanda and regained her power; the mountains bowed down to Skanda and came back to the Earth, and all creatures worshipped Skanda on the fifth day of the lunar month (III, 225).- § 497. Terrific prodigies were seen everywhere. The rehis tried to restore tranquillity to the universe. The inhabitants of the Caitraraths forest accused the wives of the six rshis, other ones the fowl (garudi) of being the cause thereof; but nobody suspected Svaha. The seven rshis divorced their wives with the exception of Arundhati, though Svaha claimed the child as hers. Viçvamitra, having concluded the sacrifice of the seven rehis, had secretly followed the god of fire, and knew everything as it had happened. He sought the protection of Skanda, and performed for him the thirteen auspicious rites of childhood (mangalāni kaumārāņi): the jātakarman, etc., etc. Though Vicvamitra informed the seven rshis of the innocence of their wives, yet they abandoned them unconditionally .--§ 498. The gods asked Indra to kill Skanda, but he dared not attack him, saying that Skanda was able to destroy even the Creator of the world. Then they let the Mothers of the world approach in order to kill Skanda, but they adopted him as their son and let him suck their breasts, especially the daughter of Krodha with a spike in her hand, and the daughter of the Red Sea, who lived on blood; and his father Agni came and, transformed into Naigameya (see BR.) with a goat's mouth, gratified him with toys (III, 226).

Srnjaya, father of Suvarnashthivin. § 595 (Abhimanyuvadhap.): There was a king of the name Caibya (C. ovya), his son was S.; the rshis Narada and Parrata were the friends of S. Seeing the daughter of S., Parvata asked if she was Cri, etc. (a). Narada obtained her as his wife. Parrata cursed Narada, saying that he should not go to heaven at his will, and Narada (enumerating what constitutes a marriage) cursed Parvata, saying that he should not go to heaven without him. Meanwhile, king S, desirous of a son, prevailed upon the brahmans to ask Narada on his behalf, and, urged by Narada, he prayed for a son possessed of every accomplishment, and whose urine, etc. should be of gold. This son was named Surarnashthivin ("gold-spitter"), and increased the wealth [of his father] beyond all limits (description). Some robbers seized the prince and slew him, and cut his body into fragments but without finding any gold. The robbers then slew one another and sank into an unimaginably awful hell. To Spijaya, who was afflicted with deep sorrow, the D.-r. Narada told the Shadaçarājika (q.v.), i.e., the histories of sixteen kings who had died (except the last, viz. Rama Jamadagnya), ending each narrative with the words: "as he died who was superior to thee and to thy son, thou shouldst not grieve for the latter who performed no sacrifice and made no sacrificial present." (Each narrative then ends with the words: Craityeti vyāharan [read vyāharat]; Nīl. takes Çvaitya (i.e. son of Cvitya) as a name of S., cf. also XII, 1052) (VII, 55-70). [Subhadrāharanaparvan(ova)] ("Arjuna's carrying away Subhadra", the 17th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Subhadrāharana.) § 252: Some days afterwards a mountain festival of the Bhojas, Vrehnis, and Andhakas was held on the Raizataka mountain; there Haladhara (i.e. Balaruma) with Reratt, followed by Gandharras, king Ugrasena, with his 1000 wives, Raukmiņeya, Çamba, Akrara, Saraņa, Gada, Babhru, Viduratha, Niçatha, Carudeshna, Prthu, Viprthu, Salyaka, Salyaki, Bhangakura, Mahurava, Hurdikya, Uddhava, etc., were present; Arjuna fell in love with Subhadra, the favourite daughter of Vasudeva, the sister of Krohna, and uterine sister of Sarana. Krehna told him to carry her away by force, as the result of a svayamvara was doubtful. They sent a courier to Yudhishthira at Indraprastha, and obtained his assent (I, 219). Arjuna set out as for a hunting expedition in his chariot, yoked with Caibya and Sugrica, and carried away Subhadra towards Indraprastha. The soldiers ran to Drārakā to the sabhā, named Sudharmā, and informed the sabhapala, who, by blowing the drum of alarm (bherim sannahikim) caused the Frehnis, Andhakas, and Bhojas to assemble at the sabhā. While they made a loud uproar, Baladera restored silence by saying that they ought first to heur what Krehna purposed. Then, seeing Krehna sitting silent, he spoke angrily about this deed of Arjuna (1, 220).

[Sudarcanopakhyana(m)] ("the episode relating to Sudarçana "). § 7208 (Anuçasanik.). Bateama said : Prajapati Manu > Ikshvaku > 100 sons; the tenth of those, Dacacva, became the king of Mahishmati; Dacacra's son was the pious Madiraços > Dyutimat > Suvira > Sudurjaya > R-r Duryodhana, in whose kingdom there was no miser, etc., and who was learned in the Vodas and Vodanta. Duryodhana begat the beautiful Sudarçand upon the river Narmada; Agni, taking the shape of a brahman, demanded her hand from the king, who would not give her to him; then Agni vanished from his great sacrifice. Duryodhana repaired to the brahmans, who became informed of the matter by Agni; then the king consented, and Agni gave, as a marriagedower, the boon to the king that he would always remain there, and Agns has always been present there to this day, and was seen by Sahadeva on his digvijaya. She bore to Agni the beautiful Sudarçana, who, even in his childhood, knew Brahman. Sudargana murried Ogharati, the daughter of king Oghavat and the sister of Ogharatha, and dwelt in Karukshetra; he took the vow of conquering death by leading the life of a householder. He instructed Oghavati that, for pleasing a guest, she must not spare even her own person. One day, when Sudarçana went out to fetch firewood, a graceful brahman came to Ogharati and required and obtained her own person. Mrtyu, with his iron club, was always at the side of Sudarçana, watching him in order to find out his flaws. When Sudarçana came home he showed no anger. The brahman turned out to be Dharma, who was pleased with Sudarcana, and said: "you have conquered Mrtyu"; Ogharati has been protected from defilement by your virtue and by her own chastity; you will attain to all the worlds in this your body, and, as yoga is in the control of Oghavati, she will follow you with half her corporeal self, being with the other half [the river] Oghavatt. Then Indra came, riding in a fine chariot, and approached that brahman.

[Sukanyopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Sukanyā"). § 405 (Tirthay.). Lomaça related: When Cyavana, the son of the maharshi Bhrgu practised austerities by the side of this lake, and, assuming the posture virasthana, had been enveloped by an anthill, king Caryati came to the lake with his 4,000 wives and his only daughter Sukanya. The viprarshi Cyavana, seeing Sukanya, was gladdened and spoke to her, but she did not hear him. Then Sukanya, seeing his eyes in the anthill, pierced them with thorns from curiosity. He, becoming very angry, obstructed the excrements and urine of Caryati's soldiers, and Caryati at last discovered the cause of their distress, and only obtained deliverance therefrom by bestowing Sukanyā upon Cyavana. Then Caryati, with his troops, went to his city, and Sukanya remained with Cyarana (III, 122). Once, when the Acrins had seen Sukanya, after she had bathed, they asked her to choose one of them for her husband, and as she refused, they entered the water together with Cyavana, and when they all came out of the tank young and beautiful they asked her to choose one of them and she choose Cyavana. Cyavana promised them to make them drinkers of some in the presence of Indra. Then the Acrins, highly delighted, ascended to heaven (III, 123). When Caryati heard that Cyarana had been turned into a youth, he came with his wife and troops to see him, and became very glad. Cyaruna caused him to perform a sacrifice with Cyavana as his priest. Cyavana was about to take up soma in order to offer it to the Acrine, Indra forbade it, saying, that they were physicians and servants, assumed forms at pleasure, and roamed about in the world of mortals, and as Cyavana did not obey he prepared to hurl his thunderbolt at him, but Cyavana paralysed his arm and fulfilled his intention. Then he created a krtya, a great Asura named Mada (description); this rushed forth to devour Indra (III, 124), who only was delivered when he had sanctioned that the Acvine should henceforth be entitled to the soma juice, saying that he had only intended to spread the fume of Cyarana and Caryati. Cyarana distributed Mada (who had been created repeatedly before) in drinks, women, gambling, and hunting.

- [Sundopasundapākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Sunda and Upasunda"). § 246 (Rājyalābhap.). Nūrada related: In days of yore the Daitya Nikumbha of the race of Hiranyakaçipu had two sons, Sunda and Upasunda, who always shared with each other happiness as well as woe, and never went anywhere unless together. Desirous of subjugating the three worlds, they practised terrible penances on the mountain Vindhya, which, by the power of their austerities at last began to emit vapour. In vain the gods repeatedly tempted them by means of every precious possession and beautiful girls, and by illusion, causing their sisters, mothers, wives, etc., to appear pursued by a rakshasa and imploring their help. When Brahmán granted them a boon, they asked to become immortal, which he refused, granting them instead that they should not need to be afraid of anything except each other, etc. They now desisted from their asceticism and returned to their abode, where they lived happy, causing even the moon to rise over their city every night, even out of season (I, 209). They set out to conquer the three worlds in the night under the constellation of Maghah, with a large Daitya force cased in mail, etc. The gods sought refuge in Brahmaloka, and the Daityas subjugated Indraloka, and vanquished the tribes of the Yakshas and Rakshases, and the Khecaras, and the Nagas in the earth, and the tribes of the Miscehas dwelling in the ocean. In order to extinguish the sacrifices that strengthened the gods, they slew those that were performing sacrifices and the assistant brahmans, etc. Then they took up their abode in Kurukshetra (I. 210). The Devarshis and Siddhas and rshis were affected with great grief, and went to the abode of Pitamaha, sented with the gods, the Siddhas, and the Brahmarshis, Mahadeva, Agni, Vayu, the sun and moon, Cakra, the Parameshthya rshis, the Vaikhanasas, the Valakhilyas, the Vanaprasthas, the Maricipas, the Ajas, the Avimadhas, etc. Brahman sent Tilottama (b) to them (I, 211). She came to Sunda and Upasunda as they were sporting in the Vindhya mountains, and from jealousy they struck each other to death with their maces. And Pilamaha then came there with the gods and the great rshis, and granted to Tilottama that she should roam in the region of the Adityas. Then, bestowing the three worlds on Indra as before, he returned to his own region.

Suvarnavarna = Vishnu (1000 names).

[Suvarnotpatti] ("the origin of gold"). § 7476 (Anuçãsanik.). Vasishtha told to Rama Jamadagnya (and again Bhishms to Yudhishthirs): After the wedding of Rudra and Devi on Himavat, all the gods, fearing that Rudra's offspring would consume the worlds, prevailed upon him to withdraw his vital seed (whence he is called Urdhvaretas); Uma cursed the gods, saying that they should become sonless; but Agni was not present. A small quantity of Rudra's seed, however, leaned into fire and began to develop: meanwhile, the gods, with Indra, were scorched by As. Taraka; A., V., R., M., A., and Sa. all became afflicted; all the regions of the deities, etc., and the retreats of R. were snatched away by As.; D. and R. repaired to Brahmán (XIII, 84), who had granted Taraka the boon that he should not be killed by D., As., or Ra., and Uma had cursed D.; Brahmán said that Agni was not there; therefore his offspring, transcending D., Da., Ra., even G., N., and birds, will with his durt destroy Taraka; Kama is eternal, and in order to slay the enemies of the gods Agni will throw Rudra's seed into the Ganga. The gods failed to find out Agni; a frog, having been scorched by the energy of Agni, appeared on the surface of the water, and said to the gods that Agni was now under the water; Agni, leaving the spot, cursed the frogs, saying that they should be without taste; the gods granted them boons (enumeration). An elephant revealed to the gods that Agni was now residing within a certain acrattha tree; Agni, entering the heart of the cami tree, cursed all the elephants, saying that their tongues should be bent back; the gods granted that they should be able to eat everything and utter indistinct cries. Agni was then revealed by a parrot, and cursed the parrots, saying that they should be deprived of the power of speech; the gods granted them to speak the letter k, and made cami-wood a sacred resting-place of fire. The waters in the nethermost regions had come into contact with Agni, and those heated waters are vomited forth by the mountain springs. The gods asked Agni to rescue D., Prajapatis, and R. from Taraka by begetting a heroic son. Agni united himself spiritually with Ganga; an Asura uttered a frightful roar; Ganga became agitated and unable to bear the seed, and threw it off on Meru; the feetus had the complexion of gold, etc.; therefore R. and D. called Agni by the name of Hiranyaretae ("having gold for his vital seed"), and the earth Vasumati "endued with wealth"). That feetus, having fallen in a thicket of reeds, assumed a wonderful form; the Krttikah reared it as their son, whence it came to be called Karttikeya; he was also called Skanda and Guha (etymology). It was in this way that gold came into existence as the offspring of Agni (Jūtavedas), and hence gold was called jūtarūpa; gold is truly the illustrious Agni, the lord of all things, and the foremost of all Prajapatis; the most sacred of all sacred things is gold: it has for its essence Agni and Soma. Vasishtha continued: This tale (Brahmadarçana) was also heard by me in days of yore about Brahmán Paramatman ("the Supreme Soul"): In days of yore (lokadau, v. 4163), Rudra, who is Brahmán, etc. ( $\delta$ ), having assumed the form of Varuna (cf. v. 4133, Varunah Pavanalmakah), performed a sacrifice, to which came the munis and all the deities with Agni, etc. (e); Çiva (i.e. Rudra) then himself poured libations into his own self. At the sight of the celestial damsels the seed (endued with sattva, rajas, and tamas) of Brahman fell upon the Earth; Pushan took it up, and it was taken with the sacrificial ladle and poured as an oblation into the fire; thence Brahman caused the orders of beings to spring into existence; further Bhrgu, etc. (5); for this reason Agni is said to be all the deities. Bhrgu was reckoned the offspring of Varuna, Angiras that of Agni, Kavi that of Brahman; Bhrgu. Angiras, and Kavi were all of them prajanum patayah; their offspring (v. 4144-4152) (Bhrgu's: n; Angirae': 8; Kavi's: 1) are called Varunah, and Kavi and Bhrgu Varunau. Agni is Brahman, Pacupati, etc. (x); gold is the offspring of Agni (v. 4146); when fire is not obtainable gold is used as a substitute, oh Jāmadaanus! (B. and C. wrongly read Jāmadagnyah, which PCR. translates "one that knows the identity of gold with fire") by one who is conversant with the vedic authorities (v. 4165), etc. (v. 4166-7); Agni sprang from Brahmán, and from Agni sprang gold (v. 4168); those persons observant of righteousness who make gifts of gold are regarded as giving away all the deities (v. 4169), etc.; he who makes a gift of gold at the second twilight succeeds in attaining to residence with (salokyam) Brahman, Vayu, Agni, and Soms (v. 4173), and to the regions of Indra (v. 4174), etc.; he has never to full down from the regions to which he attains (v. 4176). After a long time Karttikeya grew up. and was chosen as generalissimo by all the gods with Indra; he slew Dai. Taraka and many other Asuras. Bhishma continued: "Thus addressed by Vasishtha [Rama] Jamadagnya made gifts of gold to the brahmans and became cleansed of his sins" (XIII, 85). [For continuation v. Tūrakavadhopākhyāna (§ 748).] Suvasa = Civa (1000 names 3). Suvāsas = Civa: VII, 9535.

Svargaparvan ("the section relating to heaven") = Svarga-§ 11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 634.—§ 7950 rohanaparvan. (Mahabharata): XVIII, 6, 280.

[Svargarohanaparvan or ohanikapo] ("the section relating to the ascension to heaven", the 18th of the greater and the 100th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Svargaparvan, Svargārohaņika(m)[parva(n)]. § 795. Janamejaya said: "Having attained to Heaven, what regions were respectively reached by my grandfathers, the Pandavas and the Dhartardshiras? Thou hast been taught everything by M-r Vydea." Vaicampayana said: "Having arrived in Heaven, Yudhishthira beheld Duryodhana blazing with effulgence and seated in the midst of Sa.; he expressed his indignation (a) and wished to come to his brothers; Narada solicited him to desist from his wrath  $(\beta)$ ; Yudhishthira indignantly  $(\gamma)$  asked for his brothers and Karna, etc. (δ) (XVIII, 1); Karna especially lay to him at heart, since his mother had ordered him to offer oblations of water unto Karna, and he had noticed the resemblance between the feet of his mother and those of -Karna; he would not stay in Heaven if his brothers were not there. The gods ordered a celestial messenger to lead Yudhishihira to the region reached by his brothers. The path was enveloped in darkness and stench, etc. (description); as he was about to turn back, he heard voices uttering piteous lamentations, calling him by name, and giving evidence to the happiness felt by his presence, and they turned out to come from Karna and his brothers, etc. (e); he could not understand this perverse order of things ( $\zeta$ ); he censured the gods and Dharma, and declared that he would stay in Hell in order to comfort his relatives. The messenger returned and represented this to Indra (XVIII, 2). All the gods: M. with Indra, V., A., Sa., R., A., Si., M-r. and Dharma came to Yudhishthira; the illusions of Hell (the river Vaitarani, etc.) disappeared; Indra informed him that Hell should be seen by every king; he who first endures Hell must afterwards enjoy Heaven, and vice versa; Yudhishthira must see Hell because he had deceived Drong in the matter of his son : similarly Bhīma, etc.  $(\eta)$  had been shown Hell; but they have all been cleansed of their sins, and they had, as also Karna, attained to regions of felicity; D., G., and Aps. should wait upon Yudhishthira; his regions are far above those of kings and equal to those of Hariccandra, etc. ( $\theta$ ). Dharma said that this was the third test to which he had put him (1). Having bathed in the celestial Ganga, he left his human body and assumed a celestial form, and became divested of all his enmities and grief. Accompanied by Dharma and praised by M-r, he reached that place where the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras, freed from wrath, were enjoying each his respective status (XVIII, 3). Yudhishthira, praised by D., M., and R., proceeded to that place where the foremost ones of the Kurus were; he beheld Govinda (Krshna) in his Brahma-form (description), adored by Arjuna; in another place Karna in the company of Surya, etc. (x); as Yudhishthira wished to question Draupadi, Indra declared that she was Cri, created for the Pandavas by Civa; her five sons are G.; G-king Dhytarashtra was his uncle Dhytarashtra; Pandu frequently comes to Indra in his excellent chariot; Bhishma is now in the midst of V.; others walk with G. and Y., etc., or Gh. (XVIII, 4). Janamejaya asked for what period Bhishma, etc. (A) remained in Heaven, and what became of them when the effect of their actions were exhausted. Sauti said: Thus questioned B-r Vaicampayana with the permission of Vydsa said: Everyone is not capable of returning to his own nature [i.e. final Emancipation, PCR.] when his deeds cease to work [the meaning seems to be that some persons lose their individuality by being absorbed into some deity before final Emancipation. but the text itself is corrupt]; this is a mystery of the gods, explained by Vyasa, who is omniscient; Bhishms attained to the state of V. [absorbed in V., not as a separate individual: sayuya, not salokya, PCR.]; therefore, now eight Vasus are seen; etc.  $(\mu)$ . Sauti then related the conclusion of Janamejaya's (b) snake-sacrifice. "I have now told thee everything that Vaicampayana narrated, at the command of Vydsa, unto the king at his snake-sacrifice. It is a sacred tale, etc., composed by Vydsa" (sulogy of Vydsa) (ν), •; eulogy, etc., of Mahabharata (ε) (XVIII, 5-6).

Svargārohanika(m) [parva] ("[the section] relating to the ascension to heaven"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 356 ("em, sc. perva, i.e. Svargārohanaparvan).

Svargārohanika(m) parva(n) ("Bhīshma's ascension to Heaven"), the 92nd of the minor parvans of Mhbhr. § 10 (Pārvas.): I, 2, 353.—§ 777. Vaiçampāyana said: When Fudhishfhira had taken leave of the citizens, etc., he comforted the widows, whose husbands had been slain, with abundant gifts, and being duly installed on the throne, he reassured all his subjects [by acts of goodwill], etc. After fifty days, seeing that the sun had begun its northern course, he set out to see Bhishma, taking with him what was necessary for the latter's cremation, accompanied by Dhytarashtra. Gandhari, Kunti, his brothers, Krehna, Vidura, Yuyuteu. Yuyudhana, and his other relatives and a great retinue, and his priests. He beheld Bhishma surrounded by R Vudsa. Narada, Asita Devala, and by the remnant of unslain kings from various parts of the country, guarded by the warriors appointed for that duty; all the inhabitants of Kurujangala were also there. When Yudhishthira had told his errand. Bhishma opened his eyes and saw all the Bharatas assembled. He seized the hand of Yudhishthira and welcomed him; he had now been lying there for fifty-eight nights, which he had felt to be as long as a century; now it was the bright fortnight of Magha, and of this one-fourth had passed away. Then he reminded Dhrtarashtra of the instructions he had received from Vyasa, and that he should regard the Pandavas and especially Yudhishthira as his own sons. Then he praised Krshna as the Supreme God, and asked him to grant him leave to die, and that he should ever protect the Pandavas: he complained that Duryodhana had never been willing to follow his counsels; he said that he knew from Narada and Vydes, that Krehns and Arjuns were R Nardyans and Nars, who had lived for a long time in Badari. Krehna then gave Bhishma leave to die and come to the Vasus, comparing him to Markandeya. Having given some few admonitions to Dhrtarāshtra, etc. (XIII, 168), Bhīshma successively caused his life-breaths to leave his body, and the parts of his body became successively free from wounds and arrows, at which the bystanders became filled with wonder. His soul passed through the crown of his head, ascended to heaven like a meteor, and soon became invisible, while the celestial kettledrums began to play, a rain of flowers fell down, and Si. and B-r. applauded. Then the Pandavas, etc. (a) cremated the corpse. Then, accompanied by R., etc. ($), they proceeded to Bhagirathi (Ganga), where they offered oblutions of water to Bhishma. Then Bhagirathi appeared and, weeping, praised Bhishma (7). Krehna comforted her, mentioning the present felicity of Bhishma as one of the Vasus, and declared that he had not been slain by Cikhandin, but by Arjuna. Ganga gave up her grief; all the kings, headed by Krehna. obtained her permission to depart, and all returned [to the city] (XIII, 169).

[Svayamvaraparvan(°va)] ("the section relating how Draupadī chose herself a husband", the 12th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Svayamvara). § 231. The Pandavas went to the Pañcala land in the company of brahmans, who told them of the svayamvara, and of Dhrehtadyumna, and Krehna (I, 184). On their way they beheld Dvaipāyana. They took up their quarters in the house of a potter, and adopting the brahmanical profession, they began to lead a mendicant life. Yajñasena (= Drupada) slways cherished the wish of bestowing his daughter on Kirijin (i.e. Arjuna), but never spoke of this wish to anybody. He therefore caused a very stiff bow to be made, which was incapable of being bent by anybody except Arjuna; and causing some machinery to be erected in the sky, he set up a mark attached to that machinery, and said: "He who with this bow and these arrows hits the mark shall obtain my daughter." Among the kings that came were Duryodhana and the Kurus and Karns. The princes entered the arena by the north-eastern gate (cicumāracirah prāpya). The arena was situated to the north-east of the capital (description of it). On the 16th day Draupadi, having bathed, entered the arena. Then the purchita of the Somakas gratified Agni, Dhrshtadyumna, possessing a voice deep as that of a kettledrum or of the clouds, taking hold of his sister's arm, stood in the midst of the arena, and said: "Hit the mark by means of these five arrows." Then he addressed his sister, reciting to her the names, etc. of the assembled princes (I, 185).—§ 232. Enumeration (a) of the assembled princes (I, 186).- § 233. There came also the devaganas on their chariots; the Rudras and the Adityas, the Vasus and the Acvins, the Sadhyas and all the Maruls, with Yama and Dhanequara (i.e. Kubera) walking ahead; and also the Daityas and Suparnas, the mahoragas, the Devarshis, the Guhyakas and the Caranas, Viccavasu, Narada and Parvata, the principal Gandharvas with the Apsaruses, and the Asuras and Siddhas (v. 7017), and Halāyudha (i.e. Balarāma), and Janārdana (i.e. Krehna), and the chiefs of the Vrehnis, Andhakas, and Yadus, always obedient to Krshna. Krshna pointed out the Pandavas to his brother Rama. When Duryodhana, the Cediking Cicupala (son of Damaghosha), Jardsandha, the Madraking Calya, etc. had in vain tried to string the bow, and Karna, though having succeeded in stringing it, had, as a suta, been rejected by Krshnā, Jishņu (i.e. Arjuna) came forward (I, 187). Some of the brahmans spoke reproachingly of Arjuna's daring undertaking, some approved of it (citing Paracurama and Agastya's drinking out of the Sea). Arjuna, bending his head to Icana and remembering Krohna, accomplished the task. The gods showered celestial flowers. Drupada was filled with joy. Yudhishthira with the twins returned home. Krehnd approached Arjuna, who soon afterwards left the lists followed by her (I, 188).- § 234. When Drupada expressed his desire of bestowing his daughter on that brahman, the kings resolved to slay Drupada and burn Krehna, but spare Arjuna, whom they took for a brahman. They rushed at Drupada, who was defended by Arjuna with the bow and by Bhims with a tree torn up by the root. Krehna then knew, and said to Balarama that they must be the Pandavas, who had escaped from the fire (I, 189). Karna was defeated by Arjuna ("accomplished in the Brahma and the Paurandara weapons", v. 7105), and the Madra-king Calya by Bhima; then Duryodhana, etc., who had been engaged with the brahmans, desisted from the combat, because brahmans, though offending, should yet always be protected. Krshna said to them that those brahmans had justly acquired the maiden. The kings returned to their respective kingdoms. Bhima and Arjuna, with difficulty, escaped from the throng, followed by Krehnd .- § 235. Kunti was filled with anxiety, seeing that her sons were late in returning from their begging tour. Then, in the late afternoon, Jishņu (i.e. Arjuna), accompanied by a body of brahmans, entered the abode of the Bhargava (i.e. the potter, Nil.) (I, 190). Bhima and Arjuna presented Krshna as their "alms", and Kunti, not yet seeing them, said: "enjoy ye all." Afterwards, she was alarmed at what she had said. Yudhishthira declared that Arjuna should wed her; but Arjuna replied that it was a sin for the younger brother to marry before the elder. Meanwhile, they all fell in love with Krehnd. 'Then Yudhishihira recollected the words of Fydea, and, from fear of a division amongst the brothers, said that she should be the common wife of them all. Krehns and Balarams then paid them a visit, and again went away (I, 191).- § 236. When Bhims and Aryuns. were turning towards the abode of the Bhargava, Dhrehtadyumna followed them and concealed himself in some part of the house. Then Bhims and Arjuns and the twins returning from their begging tour in the evening, gave everything to Yudhishihira. Kunti caused Krehna to distribute it, giving to Bhima alone as much as to all the others, because he always ate much. Then they laid down for the night, and Dhrehtadyumna overheard their conversations. In the morning Dhrshfadyumna set out to report it to Drupada, who was sad, because he did not know, if perhaps a man of mean descent had taken away his daughter, though he thought it possible that it was Arjuna (I, 192).

Tapatām gati(h) = Civa: X, 257.

Tapatī, daughter of Sūrya (the Sun) and wife of Samvaraņa. § 154 (Pūruvamç.): I, 94, 3738 (Saurī, by Samvaraṇa, mother of Kuru).—§ 156 (do.): I, 95, ††3791 (Vaivasvatīṇ, do.).—§ 222 (Tapatyup.): I, 171, 6517, 6521, 6530, 6535; 172, 6563 (6578), 6578 (Savitryavarajā sutā); 173, 6598, 6605 (Sāvitryavarajā sutā), 6608, 6609, 6610, 6612, 6616, 6628, 6631, 6632 (Vaivasvatī, the story of Saṃvaraṇa's gotting T. as his wife). Cf. Saurī, Sāvitryavarajā, Vaivasvatī.

Tāpatya, pl. ("descendants of Tapati"). § 222 (Tapatyup.): I. 171. 6517.

Tāpatya, sg. (do.) = Arjuna: I, 6514, 6516, 6632.

Tāpatya, adj. ("relating to Tapatī"). § 11 (Parvasangr.): 1, 2, 387 (ākhyānam, i.e. Tapatyupākhyāna).

Tāpatyavardhana = Arjuna: 1, 6505.

[Tapaty-upākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Tapati"). § 222 (Caitrarathap.). Arjuna asked why he had called him Tapatya, and Citraratha said: "Sarya had a lovely daughter Tapatī, the younger sister of Savitrī. Rksha's son, the king Samvarana, duly worshipped Sūrya; to him Surya resolved to bestow his daughter. Once, when Samvarana went on a hunting expedition, his steed died from fatigue on the mountain, and he began to wander on foot and saw Tapati alone, and declared her his love. She did not speak a word, but disappeared. He wandered through the whole forest in search of her, and failing to find her, indulged in lamentations (I, 171). He fell down on the earth. Then she appeared again. He asked her to marry him according to the Gandharva form of marriage. She said that she loved him, but told him to ask her father Aditya for her hand, with worship, ascetic penances, and vows (I, 172). Tapati then ascended to the skies, and Samvarana again fell down on the earth. At last his followers found him, and his minister raised him up and sprinkled his head with water, etc. Regaining his consciousness, Samvarana sent away all his attendants with the exception of his minister alone, and then began to worship Surya. He also thought of his purchita, the rehi Vasishtha. After the king had stayed thus on the same spot day and night, the Viprarshi Vasishtha came there on the 12th day. Vasishtha knew at once, by his ascetic power, what had happened and ascended to the sky in order to see Surya, and asked him to give Tapati to Samvarana. Samvarana, with due rites, took Tapati's hand on that mountain resorted to by the gods and the Gandharras. And the king caused Vasishtha to be proclaimed his regent in his capital and kingdom, etc., and sported with his wife in the woods on that mountain for twelve years. Now Indra for twelve years poured no rain in his capital and kingdom. Then Vasishtha brought Samvarana and his wife back into the city, and then Indra poured rain in abundance. Samvarana, with Tapati, performed sacrifices for twelve years. Their son was Kuru, the ancestor of Arjuna (I, 173).

Tārakārāja ("king of the stars") = Soma (the Moon): III, 1678.

Tārakavadhopākhyāna ("the episode relating to the destruction of Taraka"; continuation of Suvarnotpatti, § 747b). § 748b (Anuçasanik.): D. and R., reduced to great distress [by Tūraka's prowess and the conduct of Gangū by throwing away Agni's seed ], urged the six Krttikah to rear that child [i.e. Skanda]. Amongst the celestial ladies there were none, save these, that could bear the seed of Agni in their wombs. Agni became gratified. His energy was divided into six portions, and a portion was placed in each of the Krttikas. All of them were delivered at the same time, and the six portions united into one. The Earth received the child from a heap of gold. He grew up in a celestial forest of reeds, reared by the Krttikus (whence he came to be called Karttikeya; etymology of Skanda and Guha). The thirtythree gods, etc. (a) came to see him; R. praised him, G. sang in honour of Kumara, with six faces, etc. (description). The gods gave him various kinds of toys, etc. ( $\beta$ ). Rā. and As. began to walk in the train of Skanda. Turaka in vain sought, by various means, to slay him. The gods made him the commander of their forces, and when he had grown up he slew Juraka with his irresistible dart as in sport, and re-established Indra in the sovereignty. Skanda became the protector of the gods and [always] did what was agreeable to Cankara (i.e. Civa). Gold is the powerful energy of Agni and was born [from the same seed] with Karttikeya; hence gold is highly auspicious. Thus did Vusishtha relate to Rama [Jāmadagnya] in days of old. By making gifts of gold Rāma became purified of all his sins, and [finally] attained to a high place in heaven that is not easily attainable by men (XIII, 86).

[Tirthayatraparvan(°va)] ("the episode relating to the pilgrimage to the tīrthas", the 36th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr. Cf. Tirthayatra). § 356: Draupadi, Bhimasena, Nakula, und Sahadera lamented Arjuna; Sahadera suggested to move from the Kāmyaka wood (III, 80). Then came the devarshi Narada who, at the request of Yudhishthira, told them what the brahmarshi Pulastya had formerly said to Bhishma about the merits of circumambulating (pradakshinam yah kuruls) the earth for the purpose of visiting the tirthas, when Bhishma was engaged in a pitrya vrata at Gangadvara (resorted to by devarshis, Gandharras, and gods) in the company of munis, and made oblations to the pitrs, gods, and rshis (III, 81). At Bhishma's request Pulastya explained the qualities of a person who will acquire merit by visiting tirthas; he said that the costly sacrifices, which only kings and very rich men are capable of affording, are not of greater merit than a sojourn in tirthas, which even the poorest may accomplish .- § 357: Then he first described Pushkara (q.v.) .-§ 358 : Then he enumerated a great many of tithus and the merit of visiting them. - § 359: Vadarā (q.v.). - § 360: Pulastya's enumeration of tithas continued (III, 82).— § 361: Kurukshetra (q.v.).—§ 362: The enumeration continued. - § 363: Ramahradah (q.v.). - § 364: The enumeration continued.—§ 365: Mankanaka (q.v.).—§ 366: The enumeration continued.—§ 367: Prthūdaka (q.v.).—§ 368: The enumeration continued .- § 369: Kurukshetra (q.v.).-§ 370: The enumeration continued (III, 84).—§ 371: Tungaka (q.v.). - § 372: The enumeration continued.-§ 373: Prayūga (q.v.).—§ 374: The enumeration continued. -§ 375: Ganga is equal to Kurukshetra, wherever one may bathe in it, especially in Kanakhala and in Prayaga, which is the most excellent; a bath in the Ganga in that place removes 100 sins. In the Krtayuga all the tirthas were sacred, in the Tretayuga Pushkara alone, in the Dvapara Kurukshetra, in the Kuliyuga Ganga. In Pushkara one should practise austerities, in Mahalaya one should make gifts, on the Malaya one should ascend the funeral pyre, in Bhryutunga one should kill oneself by fasting; bathing in of one's race upwards and downwards, etc.; as long as one's bones lie in contact with the water of the Ganga, so long does one live, honoured in heaven (Srargaloke). Pitamaha hus said that no tirtha is equal to the Ganga, no God to Keçara, and none is superior to brahmans. This truthful description one should recite only to the twice-born, etc. (*). In these tirthas have bathed the Vasus, the Sadhyas (so B.), the Adityas, the Maruts, the Agvins, and the Rehis, who are equal to the gods. Only men of piety and learning are able to visit these tirthas on account of their purified senses, their belief in god (āstikyāt), and their acquaintance with the Vedas (end of Pulastya's discourse, in which Yudhishthira sometimes is addressed instead of Bhishma).—$ 376: Narada continued: Then Pulastya disappeared, and Bhishma (who understood the castras), at the command of Pulastya, wandered over the earth and ended his tirthayatra at Prayaga. The man that so walks about the earth is rewarded after death as much as for 100 horse sucrifices. "So wilt thou Yudhishthira obtain the eight-fold (ashtagunam) dharma, as Bhishma did before, and because thou wilt lead the rshis, thy merit will be eight-fold; those tirthas are infested by Rakshasas, and no king, save thyself, has gone there (*). The foremost of rshis are always there and expect thee: Valmiki, Kacyapa, Atreya, Kundajathara, Viçvamitra, Gautama, Asita Dovala, Markandeya, Galura, Bharadvaja, Vasishtha, Uddalaka, Caunaka with his son, Vyasa, Durvasas, and Jabali. With them do thou visit these tirthas. The great rshi Lomaça will come to thee, do thou follow him and me to these tirthas." Then Narada disappeared and Yudhishthira spoke to the uscetics of the tirthas (III, 85) .- § 377: Dhaumya-tirthakathana (q.v.).- § 378: While Dhaumya was speaking thus, Lomaça arrived and told that Arjuna had obtained Brahmaçiras (b), learnt the Gandharva Veda, etc. (III, 91). Lomaça said that Arjuna had asked him to cause Yudhishthira to visit all tirthas, like Manu and other rajarshis, and protect him from the Rakshasas as Dadhica had protected Indra and Angiras had protected the Sun. Lomaça had twice before visited the tirthas. At the command of Lomaça, Yudhishihira caused the citizens, brahmans, and Yatis, who were not able to endure the privations of the journey, to return to Hastinapura, where Dhrtardshtra gave them their propor allowances from affection for Yudhishthira, and Yudhishthira, with only a small number of brahmans abode for three nights at Kamyaka cheered by Lomaca (III. 92). The brahmans, who dwelt in the wood, prevailed upon Yudhishthira that he allowed them to partake of the tirthayatra. Just when they were about to start, Vyāsa, Parrata, and Nārada came to Kamyaka, and caused them not only to fulfil human vows by purifying the body, but even divine vows by purifying the heart, that it might be free from evil thoughts and harbour only friendly feelings towards everybody. When those celestial and human rshis had performed the usual propitiatory ceremonies, and when they had worshipped the feet of Lomaca, Dvaipāyana, Nārada, and the devarshi Parvata, the Pāndavas and Krshna started towards the east with Dhaumys and the ascetics on the day following Margaçirshi, when Pushya was in ascendance, dressed in bark and hides, with matted locks, cased in mail, and armed with swords, etc., with Indrasena and other attendants with some fourteen (paricaturdaçaih) chariots and a number of cooks (III, 93). As Yudhishthera asked why he who is virtuous is unhappy, and his enemies who are sinful, happy, Louisca said that sinful men often prosper in consequence of their sins, but at last they are overtaken by destruction, even as in the devayaga the Daiteyas and Danavas (Asuras), who practised vice (adharma) and did not visit the tirthas, for a time prospered by their sin and vanquished the gods, who practised virtue and visited the tirthas; at last, when the good qualities, prosperity, etc., left the Asuras and went to the gods, while bad qualities, adversity, etc., came to the Asuras, and Kali possessed them, they were overtaken by destruction. Nrga, Cibi Austnara, Bhagiratha, Vasumanas, Gaya, Puru, and Pururavas had by practising ascetic penances and visiting tirthas, etc., obtained fame and wealth, etc., and so would Yudhishthira, and as Ikshraku with his sons, etc., and Mucukunda, Mandhatr, and Marutta, and the gods and devarahis obtained fame by the power of asceticism, so would Yudhishthira, while the Dhartarashtras, enslaved by sinfulness and ignorance, soon would be exterminated (III, 94).- § 379: The Pandavas with their followers, proceeding from place to place, at last arrived at Naimisha, and thence to the Gomati, etc. (enumeration of tirthas visited). - § 380: Brahmasaras (q.v.).-§ 381: Gaya (q.v.). - § 382: Thence they came to the hermitage of Agastya, and dwelt in Durjaya (i.e. Manimati, the city of Vatapi, Nil.); there asked by Yudhishthira Lomaça told: Agastyopākhyāna (q.v.).- § 383: Description of the Ganga (b). Then, having at the suggestion of Longca, with his brothers and Krehna, bathed in Bhrgos tirtham (c) and gratified the gods and Pitre, Yudhishthira blazed forth in brighter effulgence and became invincible. At his request Lomaça told Jumadagnyatejohunikathana (b) (v. Rāma1).- § 384: Yudhishfhira wished to hear the details of Agastya. Lomaça related: Agastyopākhyāna (q.v.).-§ 385: At the request of Yudhishthira Lomaça related how Agastya had caused Vindhya (q.v.) to cease to increase (§ 385), how Agastya drank up the Ocean (§ 386, cf. Agustyopākhyāna), Sagara (§ 387), Asamanjas (§ 388), Gangavatarana (§ 389) .- § 390: Then Yudhishthira proceeded to the rivers Nanda and Aparananda and the Hemakafa (b, cf. Rehabhakufa) mountain. Having, at the command of Lomaça, buthed in Nanda, they proceeded to the river Kauçiki (c) with the hermitages of Viçvamitra and of Kaçyapa, the father of Rehyacriga (d) .- § 391: At the request of Yudhishthira Lomaça told the history of Rshyacriga (q.v.)—§ 392: Starting from Kauciki, Yudhishthira in succession repaired to all the sacred shrines (ayalanani) and came to the sea where the Ganga falls into it, and bathed in the centre of 500 rivers. Then they proceeded by the shore of the sea towards the Lomaça suid: "Here is the river Kalinga country. Vaitarant (b)." When they had all bathed in the Vaitarant, Yudhishthira felt as if he were carried off from the region of men, and beheld all worlds, and heard the reciting of Vaikhanasas, whom Lomaça declared to be at the distance of 300,000 yojanas. Lomaça ordered him to be silent, as this was the divine forest of Svayambhū (Svayambhuvo vanam) (c); taught by Lomaca the words to be recited (Om namo vicuaguptāya, etc. [a]) Yudhishthira mounted the altar of Kacyapa and bathed in the sea; then he went to the Mahendra mountain and spent the night there (III, 114).- § 393: Lomaça told Yudhishihira the names of the ascetics (Bhrgus, Angirases, Vasishthas, Kacyapas), and he, with his brothers, paid a visit to them. Akrtavrana, a follower of Rama Jamadagnya, told him when Paracu-Rama (q.v.) appeared, and that the following day was the 14th .- § 394: At the request of Yudhishihira, Akriavrana (b) related the story of Arjuna Kartavirya (q.v.), and Jamadagni (q.v.), and Paraçurāma (q.v.) (§§ 394-8) —§ 399: Mahendrācala-gamana (q.v.).-§ 400: On their journey to the tirthes they bathed in a holy stream, and thence reached to Goddvart and to the sea (in the Dravida country); then to Agastyatirtha and the Naritirthas, where they heard of and praised the deed of Arjuna, and gave away thousands of cows, and by and by they reached Curparaka (C. Surp°), where they saw the altar of Rcika's son surrounded by crowds of ascetics, and the shrines of the Vasus, of the hosts of the Maruts, of the Acrins, Vairasvata, Aditya, Dhanegrara, Indra, Vishnu, Savitr, Bhava, Cundra, Divakara, and of the lord of waters, and of the host of Sadhyas, of Dhatr, of the Pitrs, of Rudra with his host, of Sarasvati, of the host of Siddhas, etc., and then returned to Curpuraka, and from this tirtha at the sea they came to Prabhasa, where they offered libations to the Pitrs and gods, and where Yudhishthira practised austerities for twelve days, subsisting upon air and water, and performing ablutions day and night, surrounded by fires kindled on all sides. There came to them Balarama, Krshna, Camba, etc., Karshni, the grandson of Cini, and other Vrshnis, and heard what had happened to them, and wept when they saw the Pandavas so exceedingly lean (III, 118).- § 401: Bala-Rāma (q.v.).-§ 402 : Satyaki, citing Caibya, etc., who did the work for Yayati, recommended that Rama, Krshna, Pradyumna, Cāmba(b), himself, Aniruddha, Gada, Ulmuka, Bāhuka, Bhānu, Nitha, the young hero Nicatha, Sarana, and Carudeshna should lead the united army of the Vrshnis, Bhojas, Andhakas, Sattvalas, and Caras (C. Suo) against the Dhartarashtras and kill them in battle, and that Abhimanyu should rule the earth until Yudhishthera had fulfilled his vow. Krshna said that the Pandaras would never accept the sovereignty unless it were won by their own prowess, and Yudhishthira assented to the words of Krshna, saying, that as Arshna alone knew him, so he alone knew Krshna, who would perceive when the time had come for bravery, and he and Satyaki would then defeat Suyodhana. Then the Yadus returned home, and the Pandavas continued their journey accompanied by Lomaça, and came to the river Payoshni (c).— § 403: Lomaça spoke of sacrifices that had formerly been performed at the Payoshni (b); he who bathed in the Payoshni would obtain the same lokas as Gaya. - § 404: Having bathed in the Payoshal they went to Vaidaryaparvata and Narmada, where they, according to the exposition of Lomaça, visited all the tirthas and shrines, giving gifts to the brahmans by 'housands. Lomaça said that this was the junction between the Tretā and Dvāpara age, where a person is freed of all his sins, and that here was performed the sacrifice of Caryati (b). Yudhishthira wished to hear more about it (III, 121). - § 405: Sukanyopākhyāna (q.v.). - § 406: Lomaca recommended to Yudhishthira to visit the abovenamed lake, and Sikataksha, and the Saindhava wood, and Pushkara (reciting the hymns of Sthanu, this being the junction of the Drapara and Treta, etc.), and Arcikaparvata(b). Here the rshis cat rice boiled in milk. Here (?) is the Yamuna, where Krshna performed austorities; there is the holy spring of Indra, where Dhatr, Vidhatr, and Varuna rose upwards. In the Yamuna Mandhatr and Somaka Sahadevi performed sacrifices (III, 125). - § 407: Mandhatrupa. khyāna (q.v.).—§ 408: Jantūpākhyāna (q.v.).—§§ 409-10: Plakshāvataraņa-gamana (q.v.).—§ 411: Çyenakapotiya (q.v.). - § 412: When they arrived at the hermitage of Cvetaketu (b) (who, with his sister's son Ashfavakra, was the best in that yuga of those conversant with the sacred lore (brahmakrtam).

where Costaketu beheld the goddess Sarasvati in her human shape and spoke unto her, "may I be endowed with the gift of speech," Lomaça related: Ashjāvakrīya (q.v.).—§ 413: Lomaça pointed out to Yudhishthira Samanga [or] Madhuvila, where Indra, after the slaughter of Vrtra, became purified from all sins. Kardamila, Mainaka (cf. Aditi), the Kanakhala mountains, Ganga, the lake Punya, the mountain Bhrgulunga, Vehniganga (PCR. Tuo), the hermitage of Sthulagiras, and that of Raibhya (b) .- § 414: Questioned by Yudhishthira, Lomaça related the Yavakritopükhyana (q.v.).-§ 418: They had soon passed the mountains Uçirabija, Mainaka, Cvela, and Kalaçaila, and saw the seven-fold Ganga (b). Here was the playground of the gods marked with their footprints (caranankitam). Now they should proceed to the mountains Kālaçaila, Çveta, and Mandara (o); protected by Kubera, etc., and by Yatudhanas, these mountains are difficult to ascend. There are also other followers of Rubera, cruel and friendly (raudrā maitrāç ca) Rākshasas. Description of Kailasa (d). Lomaça asked Varuna, Yama, Ganga ("the daughter of the mountain", v. 10836), Yamuna, the mountain, the Maruts, the Acvins, the rivers to vouchsafe Yudhishthira safety from gods, Asuras, and Vasus, and the mountains. Yudhishthira recommended them all to practise here the utmost cleanliness, and asked Bhima to protect Krehna, who, in times of danger, even if Arjuna were present, ever sought protection from Bhīma (III, 139).—§§ 419-23: Gandhamādana-praveça (q.v.). - § 424: Bhima-kadali-khanda-praveça (q.v.).- §§ 425-6: Hanumad-Bhima-samvada (q.v.).- § 427 : Tretā-yuga (q.v.). -§ 428: Dvāpara-yuga (q.v.).-§ 429: Kali-yuga (q.v.).-§ 430: Hanumad-Bhima-samvada (q v.). — §§ 431 - 4: Saugandhikāharaņa (q.v.).

When, however, the three cities came together in the firmament he shot that terrible shaft of three knots, inspired with the Yugu fire and composed of Vishnu and Soma. While the triple city began to burn, Parrati repaired thither to behold the sight; she had on her lap a child having a bald head with five tufts of hair on it; Indra endeavoured to strike the child with the thunderbolt, but Mahadera (i.e. the child) paralysed his arm. Indra, with the gods, repaired to Brahmán, who, understanding that it was Çira, came with them and recited a hymn (00). [Tripurākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Tripura"). § 606 (Karnap.). The first combat between the gods and the Asuras was about Taraka (Tarakamayah). The Daityas were defeated. Then the three sons of Taraka (Tarakaksha, Kamalaksha, and Vidyunmalin), by practising austerities, obtained boons from Pitamaha (who refused to give them immunity from death): "residing in three cities, we will rove over the earth; after 1000 years we will come together, and our three cities also will become united into one; that foremost one amongst the gods who will, with one shaft, pierce those three cities united into one will be the cause of our destruction." The great Asura Maya (Viçvakarmanam ajaram Daitya-Danara-pājitam) constructed the three cities: Tārakāksha's of gold in heaven, Kamalaksha's of silver in the welkin, and Vidyunmālin's of iron on the earth; all in such a way as to revolve in a circle; each 100 yojanas in breadth and 100 in length (description). Those three Daitya kings (Danaras) soon assailed the three worlds, and millions upon millions of flesh-eating Danaras, who had before been defeated by the gods, came to them and settled in the three cities: Maya supplied them with everything by his illusive power. Turakaksha's heroic son Hari, by penances, obtained from Brahmán a boon: a lake in his city capable of reviving the dead when thrown into it. They then exterminated all cities and towns, drove the gods from all places, and roamed over celestial forests, etc., and the asylums of R. Indra, with the Maruts, having tried in vain to pierce the three cities, repaired with the gods (Adityas) to Brahmán, complaining of the Asuras. Brahman said that no one else, save Sthanu (Içana, Jishņu, i.e. Çiva), could pierce the three cities with one shaft. They all, with Brahman and R. (devoted to penances and uttering the eternal words of the Vedas), sought Bhara (Cankara, i.e. Civa), who had perfect knowledge of the Soul, beholding in him those diverse forms that each had individually conceived in his own heart, and praised him (a) (VIII, 33). After the fears of P., D., and R. had been dispelled, Brahmán explained the matter to him. He said that they should fight united and with half his energy; as they said that they could not bear half his energy, he promised to slay the foes endued with half of their united energy. From that time Cankara came to be called Mahadeva. Gathering portions from all forms in the three worlds they let Viçvakarman construct him a chariot; they made Viehnu the point, Soma the head, and Agni the staff of the arrow; Earth the chariot; Mandara its axle; Ganga its jangha; the points of the compass its ornaments; the constellations its shaft; the Kria-age its voke; Vāsuki its kūbara; Himarat and Vindhya its apaskara and adhishthana; the Udaya and Asta mountains its wheels; the Ocean (the abode of the Danavas) its other axle; the seven R.'s its parishkara; Day and Night, etc., its anukarsha; the planets and the stars its wooden fence; dharma, artha, and kama its trivenu; the herbs and the creepers, etc., its bells; the sun and moon were made its [other] wheels; Day and Night its wings; the ten foremost of Snakes Dhrtarashtra, etc., its [other] shaft; the sky its [other] yoke; the clouds Samrartaka and Balahaka the leathern strings of the yoke; the twilight, Dhrti, Medhā, Sthiti, Sannati, and the firmament with planets and stars its covering-skins; the regents of the world (Indra, Varuna, Yama, and Kubera) its steeds; the cardinal and subsidiary directions its reins; Vashatkara the good; Gayatri the string attached to the goad; the four auspicious days (v. the note of PCR., p. 112) the traces of its steeds; the P. (Rohakah) presiding over them the pins; Action and Truth and Penance and Profit its chords; Mind the ground; Speech the truck; it was resplendent with lightning and Indra's bow; that space of time, which, on a former occasion, had, in the sacrifice of Icana, been fixed as a year, the bow; the goddess Savitri the bowstring; a celestial coat of mail was made, sprung from the wheel of Time; the golden mountain Meru was made its flagstaff; the clouds with flashes of lightning its banners. Cankara placed upon it his own celestial weapons. Making the sky its flagstaff, he placed upon it his bull; Brahmadanda, Kuladanda, Rudradanda, and Fever became the protectors of the sides of the chariot; Atharvan and Angiras the protectors of the wheels; the Rgreda, the Samareda, and the Puranas stood in front of the chariot; the itihasa and the Yajurveda were the protectors of the rear; all sacred Speeches and Sciences stood around it, and all hymns and Vashatkara; om in the van. Having made the year with the six seasons his bow, he made his own shadow (i.e the Deathnight, Raudri kalaratri, Rudra being Kala) the bowstring; Vishnu, Agni, and Soma the arrow (v. supra); the universe is said to consist of Agni and Soma, and similarly to consist of Vishnu, who is the soul of Bhava. Cankara placed on that bow his wrath, the unbearable fire of anger, born of the wrath of Bhrgu and Angiras. The Wind (Cvasana) was caused to breathe fragrance. The great R., G., D., Aps. praised Mahadeva when he was about to ascend the chariot. He asked to get as his driver him who was superior to himself; the gods prevailed upon Brahmán to become his driver. The great R., G., D., Aps. praised Mahadeva after he had ascended the chariot. His bull uttered tremendous roars, so that many descendants and followers of Taraka breathed their last. Frightful portents appeared. In consequence of the weight of Soma, etc. (3), the chariot seemed to sink. Then Narayana, issuing out of the point of the arrow, assumed the form of a bull and raised the chariot. Rudra, standing on the head of his bull and the back of his steeds, beholding the Danaca city, cut off the teats of the horses and clove the hoofs of the bull; from that date the hoof of the bovine species came to / be cloven and the horses to be without teats. He had united the Paçupata weapon with the shaft. When the three cities became united, the D., Si., and great R. uttered the word Jaya adoring Maheçvara. When he had shot his arrow the cities began to full down, and burning the Asuras, he threw them into the western ocean. The fire, born of his wrath, he quenched, lest it should reduce the three worlds to ashes. D., R., and the three worlds gratified Sthānu.

[Tuladhāra-Jājali-samvāda(h)] ("the conversation of Tulādhāra with Jājali"). § 680b (Mokshadh.). Bhīshma said: There was once a brahman Jājali, living in a forest; he proceeded to the sea-shore and practised penances (description) for many years. Living within the waters he roamed through all the worlds with the speed of mind. Once, unseen by Ra., he thought: "there is none equal to me"; Pg. said to him that even the celebrated Tuladhāra

Tumbavīņa—Tushāra. 684

(engaged in buying and selling) was not worthy of saying such words. R. wished to see Tuladhars: Ra. raised him from the sea and showed him the road. Arrived at Varanasi, he met Tuladhara and spoke to him thus (!). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma described those difficult feats that Jajali had performed before; while he stood as a wooden post rapt iu yoga, a pair of kulinga birds (catakan, v. 9317) built their nest on his head, laid their eggs there, their young ones came out, and only when the latter did not come back, even after a month, Jajali left that spot. Then he began to slap his armpits and proclaim loudly: "I have won great merit." Then an invisible voice in the sky said: "Thou art not equal to the wise Tuladhara at Varanasi; even he is not fit to say what thou sayest." Jājali, filled with wrath and desirous of meeting with Tulādhāra, began to roam over the whole earth, observing the vow of silence and passing the night at that spot where evening overtook him. After a considerable time he reached Varanasi and saw Tuladhara engaged in selling miscellaneous articles (panyani). dhara stood up and saluted him, mentioning his dealings with the birds, etc. (XII, 262). Asked by Jajali, the vaiçya Tuladhara discoursed to him upon the ways of morality; "in every creature that is endued with the five senses live all the deities, Surya, etc. (a); the goat is Agni; the sheep is Varuna; the horse is Surya; Earth is Virāj; the cow and the calf are Soma: the man that sells those can never obtain success . . . In days of yore many R. (and Yatis) rebuked Nahusha for having slain a cow (which is declared in the scriptures to be like unto one's mother) and a bull (which is declared to be like to the Creator himself); in order to purify Nahusha, however, they divided that sin in 101 parts, and converting the fragments into diseases, threw them among all creatures, but declared that they should not be able to pour libations in his sacrifice" (XIII, 263). Jājali said that Tuladhara's doctrines smacked of atheism, which the latter denied, discoursing on sacrifice, saying that brahmans, having given up the sacrifice ordained for them (i.e. Yoga), had betaken themselves to the performance of sacrifices that are for kshatriyas (i.e. all other sacrifices). "Instead of all animals the rice-ball is a worthy offering in sacrifices; all rivers are as sacred as the Sarasvati, and all mountains are sacred; the soul is itself a tirtha; do not wander about on the earth to visit sacred places" (XII, 264). Tulādhāra caused Jajali to summon the birds that had been reared by the latter; they made answer agreeably to the religion of ahimså (NIl.). "Faith is the daughter of Sarya, etc.," quoting a verse sung by Brahmán, exalting Faith; "the food of a liberal usurer is acceptable, but not the food of a miser: . . . want of faith is a high sin; faith is a cleanser of sins." After a short while, Tukidhara and Jajali both ascended to Many truths of this kind were spoken of by Tulādhāra; Jājali, having heard his words, betook himself to tranquillity (XII, 265).

In days of old, when the Vedas had been lost, the rshi Sārasvata of Angiras' race seated at ease on the upper garments of the rshis in the forest of T. made the rshis recollect all that they had learned before, only by distinctly pronouncing the syllable om. There the rshis and the gods, Varuna, Agni, Prajāpati, Hari Nārāyaṇa, Mahādera, and Pitāmaha, appointed Bhrgu to officiate at a sacrifice, and Bhrgu once more performed the agnyādhāna for all these rshis, gratifying Agni with a portion of clarified butter according to the ordinance. There the great ascetic Trita had lived and drunk soma in a pit where his two brothers had left him, and therefore were cursed by him. Requested by Janamejaya Vaicampayana related: In a former yuga there were three brothers who were ascetics: Ekata, Dvita, and Trita, like to Prajapati, having by their tapas won Brahmaloka (Brahmalokajitah), and being blessed with children. At last their father Gautama died, having passed a long life here. Those kings who had been his yajamānas continued to pay respect to his sons. Once, thinking of performing a sacrifice and having received animals from their yajamānas, those maharshis came towards the east. Trita was walking in front, Ekata and Dvita in his rear, bringing up the animals. Ekata and Dvita thought of taking the kine away and deserting Trita. In the night they saw a wolf. Trita ran in fright and fell into a deep pit on the bank of the Sarasrati. Though hearing his wails of woc, his brothers deserted him. Trita feared to die because he had not earned the merit of drinking soma, and in imagination performed a sacrifice. himself being the holy and uttering the ress, yajushes, and samans (description). Brhaspati prevailed upon the gods to go there lest Trita should become angry and create other Trita duly gave them their shares with proper mantras; they granted him boons: that the gods should deliver him [from the well], and that he who bathes in that well shall have the end which is attained by persons who have drunk soma. At these words the Sarasvati, with her waves, appeared within that well. Ruised aloft by her, Trita emerged and worshipped the gods. Meeting his brothers he cursed them, saying that they should become wolves and have for offspring leopards and bears and apes

When the Pandavas had encamped on the bank of the Hiranvati, the Rauravas also fixed their encampment. Then Duryodhana consulted with Karna, etc. (a), and sent Ulaka to the Pandavas and Somakas in order to irritate them still more, with insulting messages to Yudhishthira (the story of the wicked cat), Krshna, etc. ($\beta$); before Arjuna he should mention the Kambojas, etc. (γ), among his troops; "I know that the Gandiva is full 6 cubits long" (V, 160). Ulūka repeated the messages to the Panduras, etc. (V, 161), and repeated his words to Arjuna once more; Bhimasena and the rest became furious; Krshna counselled Ulūka to retire in time; Ulūka once more repeated his words; they became still more enraged, especially Bhima, who said that he would certainly drink Duhçasana's blood; also Sahadera, etc. (δ), gave him answers for Duryodhana; Sahadeva would slay Ulūka before the eyes of Çakuni, and then Çakuni himself (V. 162). Arjuna said that Duryodhana's contrivunce of seeking cover behind Bhīshma would be of no avail, as he would himself slay Bhishma; the same said Cikhandin ("I have been created by the Creator for the destruction of Bhīshma"); Dhrehfadyumna would slay Drona with all his followers and friends. Uluka related it all to Duryodhana. Messengers instructed by Karna promulgated: "array tomorrow before sunrise" (V, 163). Dhrshtadyumna began to select combatants in order to pit them against particular warriors of the hostile force (e) (V, 164).

[Umā-Maheçvara-samvāda] ("the discourse between Umā and Çiva"). § 768b (Ānuçāsanik.): Nārada said: Once, Civa on Himavat, the resort of Si. and Ca., practised severe penances, surrounded by Aps., etc. (a) (copious descriptions). Then came Uma (description) and with her hands covered the eyes of Cira from behind, and darkness arose all around; but suddenly the darkness disappeared: a third eye appeared on his forehead and consumed the mountain; Uma stood before him with her hands joined; he directed benignant looks towards the mountain, which, in a moment, was restored to its former condition. Umd asked why his eastern, northern, and western faces are so handsome, and the southern so terrible (1); why his matted locks are tawny and erect (2); why his throat is blue (3); why he has always the Pinaka in his hand (4); why he is always a brahmacarin with matted locks (5). Civa promised to explain it to her (XIII, 140). Civa answered the above questions (1): "In days of yore Tilottamā, created by Brahmán (cf. I, ch. 211), circumambulated me; in whatever direction she turned, a new face of mine appeared through my yoga-power; with my eastern face I exercise the sovereignty of the universe; with my northern I sport with thee (i.e. Umā); with my western I ordain the happiness of creatures; with my southern I destroy all creatures. (2 and 5): In order to do good to all creatures. (3): In days of yore, Indra, desirous of acquiring my prosperity hurled his thunderbolt at me, which scorched my throat. (4): In order to accomplish the purposes of the gods." Umā: Why hast thou selected a bull for thy vehicle? Cira: In days of yore, Brahmán created Surabhi (the colestial cow); once, froth fell from one of her calvas on my body; my wrath scorched all the kine which became diversified in hue; Brahman pacified me and gave me this bull both as a vehicle and as a device. Uma: Why dost thou reside in the cemetery (description), abandoning thy many abodes in heaven? Cira: I do not see any spot that is more sucred than the cemetery, and my Bhūtas love to reside in such spots. Umq: What are the indications of dharma? Civa: Abstention from injury, etc. Umd: What are the duties of the four castes? Cira enumerated them. Uma: What are the common duties of all the castes? Civa: Whenever the world is created, three eternal religions are created by Brahmán: the Voda, the smrti, and the practice of the righteous, etc.; there are four classes of bhikshus : kuficaka, bahūdaka, hamsa, and paramahamsa (each in turn being superior to the preceding one; v. Nil.). Uma: What is the religion of the rshis (munis)? Cira: (1) the Phenapas always gather the froth from the ampta that Brahmán drank at a great sacrifice. (2) The Valakhilyas in the solar disc, adopting the practice of the birds, live by picking up grains (uniche), clad in deor-skins or bark of trees; they are only as big as the joint of the thumb; they have burnt all their sins by severe penances. (3) The Cakracaras in the Somaloka, near to Pitrloka, live by gleaning [differently

Nil.], devoted to compassion. (4) The Samprakshalas, Acmakuttae, and Dantolukhalikae [v. Nil. and the note of PCR., p. 642], near the gods [called] Somapas and Ushmapas (C. U°), live by gleaning ["drinking the rays of Some." PCR.], together with their wives, etc. (Cive copiously described the religion of the R. in general) (XIII, 141). Umā: What is the religion of the Vanapraethas? Civa described it (vīrūsana, maņdūka-yoga, paurņamāsya, caturmāsya, etc.); they attain to Brahmaloka or Somaloka. Uma: What is the religion of the munis (munisanghasys) in their doctrines of perfection (siddhivadeshu; i.e. jhanagoshthishu, Nil.; "followers of the scriptures treating of ascetic success," PCR.)? they live unrestrained in the forest, together with their wives. Civa: Their characteristics are the shaving of the head, yellow robes, passing the night at home, ablutions three times a day, hotra, samadhi, adherence to the path of the good, etc. All those duties of which I have spoken before as belonging to forest-recluses, are the duties of these also, etc. (copious description). Asked by Umd. Civa said: By fasts, etc., one attains to heaven and sports with G.; by mandukayogs and diksha with the Nagas; by living with deer, etc., one attains to Amaravati; by subsisting upon air or water, fruits and roots, one attains to the riches of Y. and sports with Aps.; by abandoning one's body in the ocean, having lived in dependence only of himself, etc., one attains to the world of Varuna; by the same practices and piercing one's feet with a stone, one rejoices with the Gh., others obtain Brahmaloka (having abandoned their bodies in fire as an oblation to the gods), Cakraloka, etc. (XIII, 142). Asked by Uma, Civa expounded the circumstances under which one may be promoted or degraded to a higher or lower order when reborn (XIII, 143). Asked by Umā, Cira (worshipped by D. and As.) discoursed as to how men succeed in ascending to heaven, and what words, thoughts, and acts are of importance in this respect and for acquiring a long life. "This is the way that was indicated by Brahmán himself" (XIII, 144). Asked by Uma, Civa discoursed about that conduct by which a man may attain to heaven (Aps., the woods of Nandana), quoting Brahmán; the unmerciful, etc., sink into hell; they who humiliate their preceptors and seniors are reborn us Cvapakas and Pukkasas. Then (asked by Uma) he explained why some men become possessed of wisdom or the contrary, blind, diseased, etc.; what acts are faulty, and what faultless; why some are observant of vows, some like Ra. (Brahmarakshasas) in conduct, unmindful of homa and vashatkara (XIII, 145). Narada said: Now Cica himself became desirous of hearing. Saying that Uma (acquainted with all duties, etc.) used to converse every day with Savitri, etc.  $(\gamma)$ , who all regard their husbands as their gods, he questioned Umd about the duties of women; "half of my body is made up of half thy body; thou . . . art the cause of the peopling of the earth." Uma said she would first consult the rivers, who, with the waters of all tirthas, are approaching Cira in order to enable him to perform his ablutions: Saraevuli (the first of all streams), going to the ocean, etc. (8). Ganga was selected for answering the question, and praised Uma's modesty; then Umd discoursed upon the duties of women in full. She should not cast her eyes on the moon or the sun or a tree that has a masculine name. The husband is the god of the woman. If a husband being poor, or diseased, or distressed, etc., were to command his wife to accomplish anything improper or unrighteous, the wife should, without hesitation, do so according to the practice allowable in time of distress, and she becomes entitled to a share in the merit acquired by her husband. Narada said: Çiva applauded Uma and dismissed the others; Bh., etc. (c), returned home (XIII, 146). Asked by R., Çiva discoursed on the glory of Vasudava, i.e. Kṛshṇa, q.v. (XIII, 147). Nārada said: At the conclusion of Çiva's speech loud roars were heard in the firmament, etc. Some of R. set out on a tirthayātrā, others returned whence they came.

[Unchavrtty-upakhyana(m)] ("the episode relating to the gleaner"). § 7186 (Mokshadh.): Bhīshmu said; M-r Narada wanders through all the worlds like Vayu, not obstructed by anything; once he repaired to the abode of Indra, who asked him if he had perceived any wonderful incident. Narada recited the following story (XII, 353): In the town of Mahapadma, on the southern bank of the Ganga, there lived a brahman of the Soma-lineage (Somanvaye, i.e. Atrigotre, Nil.), endued with amiability, etc.; he was in great trouble with regard to the value of following the ordinances of the Vedas, or the [Dharma]castras, or the duties that eminent men of former times have performed (cishtacirna). Then there came to him a wise brahman as a guest (XII, 354); him he asked what he, having entrusted his duties as a householder to his son, should do in order to perform the highest duty of men, as he had no respect for the religion of the Yatis, who depend upon alms. The guest said that he was himself perplexed, as heaven had many doors (examples) (XII, 355); he told him (according to what he learnt from his preceptor) to repair to Padma, the righteous Naga, who lived in the city called after the Nagae in the Naimisha forest, on the banks of the Gomati, whence, in a former creation (purvabhisarge) the wheel of righteousness was set in motion (dharmacakram pravartitam), and where all the gods had, in days of old, performed a great sacrifice, and where king Mandhatr neglected (atikramañ cakre) Indra (XII, 356). The host became delighted, and passed the night happily conversing with his guest about the fourth mode of life (caturthadharma) [i.e. sannyāsa, renunciation, PCR.; = mokehadharma, Nil.]; the next morning, having dismissed his guest, he set out for the abode of the Naga (XII, 357), was shown the way by an ascetic, and received by the beautiful wife of the Naga; as the Naga had gone to draw the chariot of Surva for a month, and would be back in seven or eight days, he passed this time on the banks of the Gomati (XII, 358). On the 6th day the Nagas of the city, seeing him abstaining from food and [only] reciting mantras, came and asked him to eat; but he wanted to keep his fast for eight days; if then the Naga-chief had not come back, he would break his fast. Then the Nagas returned (XII, 359). When the Naga-chief came home, he was informed by his wife about the brahman's arrival (XII, 360). The Naga doubted whether that brahman was a human being, as the Nagas, even by D., As., and D-r, are considered to be endued with great energy; his wife told him to go and speak to the guest without the wrath which is natural to Nagas; the Nage himself also blamed wrath, citing Ravana (who became the rival of Cakra and was slain by Rama) and the sons of Kartavirys (who were slain by Rams Jamadagnya) and Kartavirys himself (XII, 361). The Nags met with the brahman (who characterized himself as a righteous being (dharmaranya = muni, Nil.)) on the banks of the Gomati, engaged in Yoga and reciting the Vedas in order to dispel all evil from the Naga (XII, 362); he asked the Naga whether he had seen anything wonderful in those regions where he had drawn the one-wheeled chariot of Vivaevat. The Naga described the wonders of which the Sun is the source (a). The most wonderful was that one day, in former times, at the hour of noon, a being came through the sky like a second sun and entered Surya (XII, 363). Surya declared it to be a brahman, who had attained to heaven on account of his having been crowned with success (siddhak) in the gleaning-vow (uncharrttivrate) (description), and because he had gratified Bhara (Civa) by praising him with samhitah, and now he "goes round the earth staying in the disc of Sarya; neither D., nor G., As., nor Pn. are superior to those creatures, that attain to this excellent end" (XII, 364). The brahman then betook himself formally to the practice of the uncha-vow (XII, 365), and having saluted the Naga, he went to Cyavana Bhargaca, who initiated him and recited the story of the brahman in king Janaka's palace to D.r Narada > Indra > the foremost brahmans. "During my (i.e. Bhīshma's) battle with Rāma, the Vasus told it to me." The brahman proceeded to another forest (XII, 366).

was sent to look after the kine. His master forbade him to enjoy the alms he received before he had offered it to him; then, being deprived by the master of the whole alms, and forbidden to go begging a second time, or to drink of the milk of the cows, or the froth that the calves threw out when sucking, he ate of the leaves of the arka plant (asclepias gigantea), whence he became blind and fell into a pit. Ayoda Dhaumya told U. to glorify the Açvins, which he did; they gave him a cake which he would not apply without offering it to his preceptor, though the latter had himself formerly obtained a similar cake without offering it to his preceptor. The Açvins gave him teeth of gold, while those of his preceptor were of iron, and restored him to sight: I, 3, ††697, ††698, ††700, ††704, ††708, ††711, ††717, ††718, ††721, ††739.

Upamanyu', Vaiyāghrapadya ('pāda C.), a rshi. § 730 (Anuçasanik.): XIII, 14, 634 (Vaiyaghrapadasya (opadyao, B.)), 655 (Krshna came to the hermitage of U., who advised him to gratify Civa, whose granting of boons he described).- § 730g (do.): Upamanyu said: In the Krtayuga there was a rehi named Vyaghrapada. I was born as his son and Dhaumys as my younger brother. Accompanied by Dhaumya, I once came to the hermitage of certain rshis. There I saw milk, which appeared to me to be like to ampta. Coming home, I asked my mother to give me some food propared with milk. Having no milk my mother was sorry. She then took a cake (of rice) and boiled it into water and placed it before me, saying that it was milk. Knowing the nature of milk, I understood that this was not milk; this I said to my mother, who then answered me that ascetics in the wood could not have milk. "Whence shall we, who live at the river, the resort of the Valakhilyas, obtain milk? In the wilderness are no offspring of Surabhi." Then she told me to devote myself to Cankara (i.e. Civa). Questioned by me about Civa my mother then, in accordance with the discourses of the munis, described the diverse forms of Mahadeva (i.e. Civa) ( $\eta$ ). I then applied myself to the practice of penances in order to gratify Civa. After a thousand celestial years Mahadera appeared to me in the form of Cakra (i.e. Indra) riding on his elephant, but I did not desire a boon from any other deity than Mahadeva. Questioned by Indra about the reason, I stated Civa to be the existent and the non-existent, the manifest and the unmanifest, the eternal and immutable, etc., and that there was nothing superior to Civa (θ). Mahādeva resides in the worlds named Bha, etc. (4). In all the encounters of the gods, etc. (a), Bhava restores power to those who meet with destruction. It is Maheçvara who made futile the boons given to Andhaka, etc. ( $\lambda$ ). He is adored by yogins, etc. ( $\mu$ ). Brahman, etc. (v), always say that there is none higher than Mahadeva. His sign (lings) is worshipped by Brahman, etc. The creatures bear only the signs of Mahadeva and his spouse, and those of Brahmán, etc. (o). "I shall never acknowledge any other deity. Nor would I take the fulfilment of all my wishes from any other deity." When I had finished this speech, the celestial elephant became transformed into a white bull (description), on the back of which Mahadeva. with Uma, was seated (description of Civa and his weapons: Pinaka (x)). The Pacupata weapon is superior to all other weapons such as the Brahma, etc.  $(\rho)$ , but the çula  $(\sigma)$  is even superior. The foremost of those conversant with the Pañcaratra (Pañoaratravidas) dwelled in his palaces. The seven rshis (β), named the Citracikhandins, uniting together, had on Meru promulgated an excellent treatise on duties; they were the seven prakrtis (i.e. mahat, ahankara, etc., Nil.), and [Manu] Svayambhura was the eighth (i.e. original Prukṛti, Nil.); they composed that treatise after having worshipped with penances Hari Nardyana for 1,000 celestial years, together with many other rshis; Nardyana ordered Sarawati to enter into the persons of these rshis and became highly pleased with the treatise, which was in accordance with the Vedas, etc. ( $\gamma$ ). Nardyans said: "According to the authority of the scriptures I have created Brahmán from grace, Rudra from my wrath, and yourselves as representing the prakrticlements. Surya, etc. (8) live and act in their respective spheres; guided by your treatise Manu Svayambhuva will declare the duties to the world, and so will Uçanas and Brhaspati, when they will arise; then this science will be acquired by king Vasu [Uparicara] from Brhaspati; upon the death of that king this eternal treatise will disappear from the world." Then Naraysna disappeared. Subsequently, when Brhaspati was born in the Angiras race in the Krta age, those seven rshis charged him with the task of promulgating their treatise, which was consistent with the Upanishads and the branches of the Vedas. Then they proceeded to the place they chose for practising penances (XII, 336). Etymology of the name Brhaspati. King Vasu Uparicara became the foremost of Brhaspati's disciples, and studied at his feet'that science of the Citraşikhandine. In his horse-sacrifice Byhaspati became the hoty, the sons of Prajapati, viz. Ekata, Deita, and Trita, the sudasyas, together with Dhanusha, etc. (e); no animals were slain in it; Hari became gratified and came and took his share, visible to Vasu, but invisible to the others. At this Brhaspati became angry and hurled the sacrificial ladle with violence into the skies, saying: "Here I place this as Narayana's share, he shall take it before my eyes." Yudhishthird asked why Harr only took his share invisibly. Bhishma answered: King Fasu and his sadasyas sought to pacify Brhaspati, saying that none should feel anger in this Krts age, as Hari himself did not feel anger, and none could see him save he to whom he became gracious. Then the rabis, Ekaia, Dvita, and Trits (the mindborn sons of Brahman) narrated that they had once undergone penances for thousands of years, to the north of Meru and on the shores of the milky ocean in order to behold Narayans in his own form, then an incorporeal voice directed them to Coctadvips on the northern shore of the milky ocean; the inhabitants there are devoted to Narayana, etc. (description) and adore only one god. Arrived there they could see nothing, blinded by the splendour of the deity; they then, once more, set themselves to practise austerities for 100 years, then they beheld the inhabitanta (description, they are conversant with the ordinances of the Pañoardira). An incorporeal being addressed them from the sky, saying that the god could only be seen by these white men, etc.: "do ye return, after the expiration of this Krta age when the Treta age comes (in the Vaivasvata manvantura) a great calamity will overtake the worlds, you shall then have to become the allies of the gods." Then Ekata, etc., returned. Hearing this Brhaspati brought the sacrifice to completion. King U. ruled his subjects righteously, and at last, giving up his body, ascended to heaven. After some time he, through the curse of the bruhmans, fell down and sank deep into the earth; but even then he, by reciting sacred mantras having Narayana for their deity, once more ascended to heaven through the grace of Nardyana (XII, 337). Yudhishihira asked why king Pasu, who was so devoted to Nardyana, did fall from heaven and sink beneath the surface of the earth. Bhishma cited the old nurrative of a discourse between the rabis and the gods. The gods once said to some brahmans that sacrifices should be performed by offering goats (aja). The rshis declared that, according to a Vedic cruti, by aja was to be understood seeds; "how can animals be slain in the Krta age?" Vasu was coming through the skies with his troops, etc., and was asked to be their judge. Having first ascertained what opinion was entertained by each of them, Vaeu, moved by partiality for the gods, said that sacrifices should be performed with animals. The ratio became very angry, and cursed him to full down from heaven and sink below the surface of the earth. He immediately fell, but at the command of Nardyana, Vasu's memory did not leave him. The gods came to his hole and said that he should have the vasor dhara (v. the note of PCR., p. 758) for his sustenance as long as he remained there. Then the gods and the rehis went away. Vasu began to adore Hari and to recite in silence those sacred mantras which had come out of Narayana's mouth in days of yore, and worshipped him in the five sacrifices which are performed five times every day. Hari Narayana (Vishau) then let Garuda take Vasu to Brahmaloka (XII. 338): XII, 336, 12712 (rājo°ā); 337, 12754 (rājo°o Vasuh), 12766; 338, 12834 (rājooh), 12838 (rūjoom (!)), 12855 (rajooh).

Varuna had coveted the girl from former times; he came to the forest and stole her away, when she bathed in the Yamund, and carried her to his wonderful city, adorned with 600,000 lakes (road ocatao with B.) with palaces and Apearases, etc. Having heard all this from Narada, U. caused him to request Paruna to restore her ("thou art a Lokapāla, not a destroyer of the world"). At Varuņa refused, and Narada related to U. that Varuna had seized him by the throat and driven him from his house, U. (Angiras) stopped the waters and drank them off, and caused the earth to dry up the 600,000 lakes, and the Sarasvati to become invisible, and the region to cease to be sacred. Uttanka (so B., C. mostly Utao), a rshi. § 11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 364.—§ 17 (cf. Paushyap.): U. was the disciple of Veda; having resisted the temptations of the wife of Vedu, he obtained leave to depart, but first wished to bring Veda some gratuity for his instruction, and having uttered this wish two times, he was ordered to procure the ear-rings of Paushya's queen for the wife of Veda. Having met with a bull (Airdvals) and a man (Indra) mounted upon it, he ate of the dung and drank of the urine (ampta) of that bull, "as his master had formerly done." Coming to the abode of Paushya, he could not discover the queen before he had purified himself properly from the leavings of his last meal. He and Paushya cursed one another. Having obtained the ear-rings, U. returned to his master. On the road Takshaka, the king of the serpents, in the shape of a mendicant, stole the ear-rings and proceeded to Nagaloka. Indra, with the thunderbolt, made a hole through which U. entered the Nagaloka, where he hymned the serpents. He there saw two damsels (= Dhatr and Vidhatr) sitting over a loom, weaving a fabric with black and white threads (night and day), further, he saw a wheel (= the year) with twelve spokes (= the months) turned by six boys (= the seasons), and then a man (Parjanya) mounted on a horse (Agni). At the injunction of the man U. blew into the anus of the horse, whence there issued flames of fire with smoke, which were about to consume the Nagaloka.

Takshaka then gave back the ear-rings and U. was borne by the horse to his master's abode. His master explained to him all he had seen during his journey. U. then proceeded to Hastinapura and told Janamejaya, who had some time before returned victorious from Takshaçila, to burn Takshaka, who had bitten Parikehit to death, and caused Kacyapa to turn back without relieving Parikshit, at a snake-sacrifice: I, 3, ††747 (°namanam), ††748, ††749, ††753, ††756, ††757 (Ulla° also C.), ††758, ††759, ††761, ††762, ††763, ††764, ††765, ††770, ††771, ††772, ††773, ††776, ††778, ††779, ††780, ††787, ††789, ††790, ††791, ††793, ††796, ††805, ††815, ††816, ††818, ††819, ††820, ††821, ††822, ††823, ††832, 833, (836), (840), 818, 849, 850.—§ 56 (Parikshit): I, 50, 1991 (reher Uosya, sc. parabhavam, all. to § 17).—§ 57 (Janamejaya): I, 50, 2014 (°sya priyam kartum, do.).-§ 474b (Dhundhumarop.): III, 201, 13491 (maharshik), 13492, (13494), 13504, (13505), 13507 (gratified Vishnu who granted him boons).—§ 476 (do.): III, 202, 13523, 13524, (13525); 203, 13546, 13550 (U. urged Brhadaçva to slay Dhundhu, but Brhadaçva directed him to Kuvalāçva). -§ 478 (do.): III, 204, 13589 (°açramam), 13591 (°açramabhyase, there Dhundhu had his abode), 13592, 13594, 13619 (U. accompanied Kuvalaçva when he set out to slay Dhundhu). -§ 784b (Anugitap.): When Krshna, on his way from Hastinapura to Dvaraka, had entered the desert, he beheld U., who enquired whether he came after having reconciled the Kurus and the Pandavas. Krehna told him the matter; filled with wrath U. threatened to curse him; Krshna warned U. (who had practised brahmacarya from the day of his infancy) against destroying his penances [by a curse? (XIV, 53). U. agreed that Krahna should first tell him "that faultless adhyātma", and Krehna explained his own identity with the creator and destroyer of all things. "R., V, Dai., Y., G., Ra., N., and Aps. have sprung from me; etc. Dharma, whose essence is compassion for all creatures, is my eldest-born offspring, and has sprung from my mind; I am Vishnu, Brahman, and Cakra (i.e. Indra)." He always acts as those beings in whose order he lives (XIV, 54). U. prevailed upon Krehna to show him his eternal Vaishnava or universal form, and praised Krshna, who granted him the boon to have water wherever he wished for it (water being scarce in such desorts) by thinking of Krshna. Once, when U. was wandering thirsty in the desert, and thought of Krehna, he saw a naked Candala (matanga) all besmeared with dirt, surrounded by a pack of dogs, and carrying a sword, and bow, and arrows; from his urinary organs there issued copious streams of water; he invited U, to accept this water; U. refused and even consured Krehna, the Candala disappeared. Krshna came and said that the Candala was Indra, whom he had ordered to give ampta to U. in the form of water, and that Indra at first had refused to do it, but at last had agreed on the condition that U. should accept it in that way. Krehna ordained that on those days in which U. would feel a desire for water, there should rise clouds raining savoury water over this desert and that they should be named U.-clouds; even to this day such clouds shower rain on the arid desert (XIV, 55). Asked by Janamejaya about the penances of U., Vaicampayana related that U.'s preceptor Gautama, having permitted thousands of disciples to return home, was so pleased with the devotion of U. that he would not dismiss him, even after 100 years, and decrepitude overtook U.; one day when he threw the load of fuel he had fetched on the earth, one of his matted locks, white as silver, 697 had become entangled with the load and fell on the earth; beholding that sign of old age, U. gave himself up to loud lamentations; the beautiful daughter of his preceptor, at the command of her father, sought to hold the tears of U. in her hands, but her hands seemed to burn with the dropping tears. and she was obliged to let them fall on the earth; the earth was unable to hold them. Asked by Gautama, U. explained the matter. Gautama permitted him to leave him; as U. spoke of the fee, Gautama said that he was already highly gratified and that if U. became a young man of sixteen years, he would give him his daughter in marriage. U. again became a youth and accepted the maiden. As he spoke of the fee to his preceptor's wife, Ahalya said that she was already gratified. U., however, insisted, and Ahalya then commanded him to bring her the celestial ear-rings which were borne by the wife of Saudāsa, who had [through the curse of Caktri] become a cannibal. Gautama blamed Ahalyā that she had sent U. to the cannibal. Ahalyā said that she had done it unknowingly, and that Gautama would protect U. U. met Saudāsa in a deserted forest (XIV, 56). Saudāsa was of frightful mien, wearing a long beard smeared with human blood, and looking like a second Yama; he congratulated himself that he had met U. at the sixth hour of the day when he was in search of food; U. maintained that while one is employed for the sake of his preceptor, one should not be injured; at last they agreed that when he had brought his preceptor the ear-rings he should come back; Saudasa told U. to go and see the queen Madaganti (near a forest fountain), as he could not himself see her at the sixth hour. Madayanti told U. to bring her some sign from her husband, as these ear-rings, when placed on the earth, would be stolen by the Nagas, if worn by one who is impure from cating, they would be taken away by the Yakshas, and if the wearer fell asleep, the gods would take them away; "also the maharshis and the Rukshasas watch for opportunities for carrying them away; they always produce gold and shine brightly at night; they protect against hunger, and thirst, and fear, and he who wears them grows in size" (XIV, 57). U. came back to Saudasa, who gave him a sign. When he had got the ear-rings, U. once more came buck to Saudasa, and asked him about the meaning of the mystic words he had caused him to say to Madayanti, as a sign. Sauddsa, referring to his own terrible condition in consequence of his being cursed [by Caktri], said that he hoped that this gift to a brahman might save him. U. asked Saudasa to give him such advice as is approved by the wise: "is it proper for me to come back to thee or not?" Saudasa said that he would then tell him never to come back. When U., on his way to Ahalya, having bound the ear-rings in the folds of his black deerskin, had proceeded for some distance he became afflicted with hunger and climbed a bilva-tree (segle marmelos), hanging his decrskin on a branch, while he plucked some fruits. Struck by some fruits the deerskin fel! down, the knot was untied, and a serpent of Airavata's race carried the ear-rings, holding them in his mouth, into an anthill. Filled with wrath, U. with his staff, pierced that anthill for thirty-five days, desirous of making a path to the nether regions; the goddess Earth became anxious; Indra came there in the disguise of a brahman afflicted with the sorrow of U., and told him that the regions of the Nagas are thousands of yojanas distant; as U. did not desist, Indra united the latter's staff with his thunderbolt, and struck with the thunderbolt, the earth opened a way to the Nagaloka

(c). U. entered the Nagaloka, very cheerless; then there appeared to him a black steed with a white tail, whose face and eyes were of coppery hue. He told U. to blow into his anus, "which thou often didst at the retreat of Gaulama in former days"; the horse turned out to be Agni; U. did as he was directed, a thick smoke enveloped the Nagaloka, the Nagas, headed by Vasuki, gave U. the ear-rings, which he brought to Ahalya (XIV, 58): XIV, 53, 1542 (municroshtham), 1544 (bruhmanacreshthah), 1555, (1556); 54, (1563); 55. (1586), (1593), 1596, 1599, 1600, 1601, 1604, 1608, 1610, 1612, 1614, 1623 (°meghāh), 1624 (do.); 56, 1625, 1626, 1628, 1630, 1632, 1638 (vipram), (1640), (1645), 1653, 1656, 1657, 1660; 57, (1664), (1666), (1673), (1675), 1676, (1678), 1680, 1681; 58, 1692, (1699), (1701), 1721, (1723), 1780, 1734, 1737, 1746, 1750.—§ 784 (do.): XIV, 59, 1751, 1752. [Vaivāhikaparvan 1] ("the section relating to the marriage of Draupadi with the Pāndavas", the 13th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Vaivāhika.) § 237. Dhrshfadyumna related what had happened: (Arjuna had large red eyes, v. 7175, and Krshad had followed him, catching hold of his deerskin, v. 7177); from their conversation on military subjects, he concluded that they were the Pandavas, of whom it had been heard that they had all escaped from the lac-house. Drupada (= Saumaki, v. 7198) sent his purchita to Yudhishthira, who said that there was no occasion for Drupada to grieve for his daughter. While Yudhishthira was saying this, another messenger from Drupada announced that the feast was ready (1, 193). The Pandavas, with Kunti and Krshnu were conveyed to Drupada's palace. Drupada wished to ascertain to which caste they belonged, and had for that purpose made ready a large collection of various articles appertaining to different human occupations: after dinner they began to observe, with interest, the implements of war, wherefore Drupada and his son thought that they were of royal blood (1, 194). Yudhishthira told Drupada who they were. Drupada vowed to restore Yudhishthira to his kingdom. Yudhishthira told him that they would all marry Krahna, which Drupada considered to be contrary to morality. While they discoursed on this matter Vyūsa arrived (I, 195). Drupada consulted Vyūsa about the wedding of his daughter. Vyūsa desired to hear the opinion of each of them. Drupada regarded the practice of marrying one wife to five men as sinful, and so did Dhrshtadyumna. Yudhishthira thought it not to be sinful. because his heart, that never inclined to what was sinful, approved of it; "it is recorded in the Purana that Jatila Gautami had married seven rshis, and a muni's daughter, born of a tree (Varkshī = Marishā, BR.], see Hariv., v. 96 foll.) married the ten Pracetases"; moreover, their mother Kunti had told them to enjoy her all. Kunti was afraid that she would be guilty of a lie. Vyasa said that Yudhishthira was right, and took Drupada apart (I, 196) and related to him Pancendropūkhyāna (§§ 238-239).- § 210. Drupada then consented, as it had been ordained by the gods. Vyūsa declared that very day to be auspicious as the moon entered in conjunction with Pushya (Paushyam yogam upaiti). Drupada and his son made preparations for the wedding, and Dhaumya, performing the usual rites, married Krshna to Yudhishthira, and then to his brothers on successive days. Draupadi regained her virginity every day after her previous marriage. Then Drupada gave to them various kinds of excellent wealth (I, 198). Drupada, after his alliance with the Pandavas, had all his fears dispelled. His ladies worshipped the feet of Kunti. Kunti pronounced a blessing upon Krshna. Krshna sent them costly presents (I, 199).

[Vaivahikaparvan ] ("the section containing the marringe of Abhimanyu and Uttara"; the 56th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). § 553. On the third day the five Pandavas, attired in white robes after a bath, etc., entered the palace of Virata and took their seats on the thrones reserved for kings. Virața rebuked Kanka (Yudhishthira) for this insolence; Arjuna praised Yudhishthira, saying that there was none like him, even amongst D., As., men, Ra., G., Y., Ku., or M.-U., and disclosed that he was Yudhishthira (b) (IV, 70). Asked by Virata which of them ther was Arjuna, etc., Arjuna pointed out Bhima (B), Nakula, and Sahadeou (both beautiful and great warriors), Draupadi, and himself. Utters spoke of Arjuna's prowess, and described each of them, especially Arjuna (" it was by him that Bhishma, Drona, and Duryodhana were vanquished"). Virata, thinking he had offended Yudhishthira, offered to bestow his daughter Uttard on Arjuna, which was applauded by Uttara, and offered his whole kingdom, etc., to Yudhishthira. Arjuna accepted Uttard as his daughter-in-law, saying that such an alliance between the Mateyas and the Bharatas was desirable (IV, 71). Asked by Virata why he himself did not wish to accept his daughter as wife, Arjuna alleged that she had confided in him as her futher, and people might entertain suspicions against her or him; by accepting her for Abhimanyu he attested her purity. Virata approved of it, and Yudhishthira gave his assent; the latter sent invitations to Krehna, etc., and so did Virața. The Pandavas took up their abode at Upuplavya. Arjuna brought over Abhimanyu and Krehna, and many Daçarhas from the Anartta country. The Kaciking and Caibya (friendly to Yudhishthira) came, each accompanied by an akshauhini of troops; Yainasena came there with the sons of Draupadi and Cikhandin, and Dhrshladuumna came with an akshauhing. All the kings that came there were lords of akshauhinis and performers of sacrifices, etc. Then came Krshna (decked with garlands), Balarama, etc., with Abhimanyu and his mother. And Indrasona, etc., having lived at Dvaraka for a whole year, came with the chariots of the Pandavas. In the train of Krshna came also 10,000 elephants, 100 thousands of horses, 100 millions of chariots. 100 milliards of foot soldiers, and innumerable Vrshni. Andhaka, and Bhoja warriors. Krshna gave to each of the Pandavas numerous female slaves, etc. Then the nuptial festival set in (description). The matrons of the Mateyas were headed by Sudeshna; but Krshna was the foremost in beauty, etc. Viraja gave [as dowry] 7,000 horses and 200 elephants, and much wealth, and offered his kingdom, etc., to the Pandavas. Yudhishthira gave all the wealth that had been brought by Krshna, etc., to the brahmans (IV, 72).

[Vaiyasvatopākhyāna(m)] ("story of Manu Vaivasvata''). § 457 (Mark.). Requested by Yudhishthira, Markandeya said: The maharshi Manu, Vivasvat's son, equal to Prajūpati (i.e. Brahmán), excelled his father and grandfather in strength, etc. He practised austerities in Badart, standing on one foot, etc., for 10,000 years. Once a small fish came to him on the banks of the Cirist and asked his protection from the greater fishes. He first reared it in a water vessel, and as it grew larger, he carried it to a large tank, and thence into the Ganga, and at last into the ocean. The fish, saying that the world was about to be destroyed, caused him to build a strong ship with a long rope and ascend it with the seven rshis and the seeds that were enumerated by the brahmans of old. The fish then appeared and was recognized by a horn, to which Manu tied the noose. And, while there was water everywhere, the fish dragged the boat through the flood for many years, until, advised by the fish, Manu tied the ship to the highest peak of Himavat, thence called Naubandhana. The fish told him that he was Brahmán, and caused Manu to create (again) by austerities all creatures with gods, Asuras, and men. This is the Mateyakam Puranam (III, 187).

[Vāmadeva-carita(m)] ("the history of Vāmadeva"). § 461 (Markandeyas.). As Yudhishthira wished to hear about the greatness of brahmans, Markandeya related: King Parikshit (B. Parikshit), in Ayodhya, of the race of Ikshvaku, was, in the forest, led far away by a deer, and by a tauk met with a beautiful maiden, who came along singing. He married her after having given her the pledge not to let her see, water, and having arrived at his capital he lived with her in privacy, and nobody could obtain any interview with him. His chief minister, having found out the matter, made an artificial forest, with a tank covered with a net of pearls, and showed it to the king. The king told his wife to plunge into this tank. She did so, and did not reappear. When the water had been baled out a frog was found. The king ordered all frogs to be slaughtered. Ayu, the king of the frogs, in the shape of an ascetic (quoting two clokas: "Do not wish to kill the frogs, etc."), told him that the queen was his daughter Suçobhana, who had deceived many kings. She was restored to the king, but Ayu cursed her, saying: "Thy outspring shall prove disrespectful to brahmans." Parikshit begot three sons on her: Çala, Dala, and Bala. Having installed Cala on the throne, Parikshit retired to the wood. One day, Cala, as he could not overtake a deer, forced his charioteer to indicate to him, to whom the Vamya horses belonged. He borrowed them from the rshi Vamadera and caught the deer, but did not return them. After a month, Vamadeva in vain sent his disciple Atreya, and then came himself, and asked for the steeds. The king, saying that such horses were not fit for brahmans, in vain offered to give him two bulls, then four asses or four mules, and as he threatened to let him be killed, Vāmadeva, saying that brahmans could not be punished, let four Rakshasas slay him with their lances. Dala, whom the Ikshvakus installed on the throne, attempted to shoot Vamadera with a poisoned arrow, but shot his own son Cyenajit, and was unable to discharge another poisoned arrow. Then he gave way, and, advised by Vamadeva, he touched his queen with the arrow and was thus purified of his sin. The queen obtained the boon from Vamadeva, that she might prevail upon her husband that they both should serve the brahmans, and he be freed from his sin, and that Vamadera should think of their weal. The king became glad and restored the Famya horses (III, 192).

Vasishtha(m) ("the episode relating to Vasishtha"). § 11 (Parvas.): I, 2, 387 (°am ākhyanam).—§ 223 (Caitrar.). Arjuna wished to hear about Vasishtha. The Gandharra said : Vasishtha is Brahman's spiritual son and Arundhati's husband; Kama and Krodha, who cannot be vanquished even by the immortals, used to shampoo his feet. Though his wrath was excited by Viçvamitra's offence, he did not yet exterminate the Kucikas. Afflicted at the loss of his sons, he did not do any dreadful deed for the destruction of Victamitra. He did not transgress Krtunta (Death) in order to bring back his lost children from the abode of Yama. It was by obtaining him that the Ikshrakus acquired this earth, and with him as their purchita, they performed many great sacrifices. "Therefore acquire a fit purchita" (I, 174). Arjuna wished to hear of the hostility between Vicramitra and Vasishtha. The Gandharva said: This old (purana) story of Vasishtha they tell in all worlds. In Kanyakubja king Gadhi, son of Kuçika, had a son Viccolmitra, who, with his ministers, used to go a hunting. Once he arrived at the hermitage of Vasishtha. who offered him arghya, etc. from his cow Nandini, who vielded everything desired; Vicramitra asked Vasishtha to give him Nandint for an arbuda of kine or his kingdom, but in vain. Then he wanted to take the cow by force. She repaired to Vasishtha, who at first did nothing, saying, "I am a forgiving brahman"; but at last he said: "I do not abandon you! Stay if you can!" Hearing this word, the cow attacked Vicramitra's troops; from her tail she began to rain showers of burning couls; from her tail she brought forth Pahlaras, from her udders Dravidas and Çakas, from her womb (yonidecat) Yavanas, from her dung (cakrt) Cabaras, from her urine Kancis, and from her sides Carabhas (B. Cabaran and kameoid instead of Kañoin), and from the froth of her mouth Paundras, Kiratas, Yavanas, Simhalas, Barbaras, Vaças (B. Khaçan), Civukas, Pulindas, Cinas, Hūnas, Keralas, and other Misechas, who attacked Victumitra's soldiers. Victumitra's troops fied, but none was deprived of life. Vicedmites then, disgusted with kehalriya prowess ("brahman prowese is true prowess"), set his mind on asceticism, and finally became a brahman and drank some with Indra (I, 175). - § 224: Kalmashapada (q.v.)-- § 225. Vasishtha patiently bore his grief, and resolved rather to sacrifice his own life than exterminate the Kauçikas. He threw himself down from the summit of Meru, entered a huge fire in the forest, and tied a strong weight to his neck and threw himself into the sea, but all in vain, and, in distress of heart, he returned to his hermitage (I, 176). Beholding it hereft of his children, he left it again and tied himself strongly with cords and flung himself into a mighty river, but the stream cut those cords and cast the rshi ashore, whence that river was called Vipaça. Once more he threw himself into a river flowing from Himavat (Haimavati), but the river immediately fled in 100 different directions, and has since been known by the name of the Catadru ("çatadhā vidruta", v. 6753). He now again went towards his hermitage, and was on the way addressed by Adreyanti, the wife of Caktri, who had for twelve years borne his child in her womb. Hearing that child in the womb reciting the Vedas with the six Angas, Vasishtha refrained from self-destruction, and, accompanied by Adreyanti, returned to his hermitage. One day he saw Kalmāshapāda, who would devour him; Adregantī was terrified, but Vasishtha restrained him by uttering "hum". and, sprinkling him with water sanctified by mantras, and freed him from his curse that had lasted twelve years. Kalmashapada promised nover more to insult brahmans, and prevailed upon Vasishtha that he accompanied him to his capital Ayodhya and begat a son for him on the queen. Then he went back to his hermitage. After twelve years the queen tore open her womb by a stone, and then was born the rajarshi Açmaka, who founded the city of Paudanya (I. 177).- § 226 : Paraçara (q.v.).

Vasishthapavaha ("the carrying away of Vasishtha"). name of a tīrthu. § 615 (Buladevatīrthayātrā): IX, 41, †2357; 42, †2358.—§ 615p (do.): A great enmity arose between Victamitra and Vasishtha, due to their rivalry in respect of ascetic austerities. The hermitage of Vasishtha was in Sthanutirtha, on the bank of the Sarasvati; on the opposite bank was the hermitage of Victamitra. There (i.e. in Sthanutirtha) Sthanu had practised penances, and having performed a sacrifice and worshipped the Sarasvati he had established that tirtha, and there the gods in days of yore installed Skanda. In that tirtha on the Sarasrati, the rshi Viçvamitra, by his penunces, disturbed Vasishtha. Viçvamitra and Vasishtha every day challenged each other in respect of the superiority of their penances. Viçramilra ordered the Sarasvatt, notwithstanding her trembling, to bring Vasishtha into his presence, that he might slay him. willingly let her do so, lest Viçramitra should curse her. Sarasvatī washed away one of her banks and bore Vasishtha (who praised the Sarasvati (q)) away and informed Kauçika (i.e. Viçvamitra) about his arrival; but while Viçramitra was looking for a weapon she quickly bore Vasishtha back to the eastern bank. Victamitra cursed her, saying that her current should be changed into blood, which is acceptable only to the Rakshasas. For a whole year she then flowed bearing blood mixed with water. The gods, the Gandharvas, and the Apsarases grieved. For this reason the tirtha came to be called F. Sarascati, however, once more got back her own proper condition (1X, 42), when some munis on a tirthauatra to the Sarasvati, having buthed in all her tirthus came to V. and saw the water mixed with blood, and that innumerable Rakshasas were drinking it. Having learnt the cause, they worshipped Mahadeea with penances and purified the Sarasrati. The Rākshasas, who were Brahma-Rākshasas (so those among vaiçyas, çādras, and kshatriyas, who hate and injure the brahmans, become Rākshasas), afflicted with hunger, sought the protection of the munis, who, having ordained what should be the food of the Rākshasas (r) solicited the Sarasvatī, who assumed a new shape called Arunā; bathing in that new river the Rākshasas abandoned their bodies and went to heaven. Ascertaining all this, Indra (s) bathed there and became purified of a grievous.sin (i.e. brahmahatya): 1X, 42, 2398.

[Vasishthopakhyana(m)] ("the episode relating to Vasishtha"). § 223 (cf. Caitraruthap.). Arjuna asked: "Why did Kalmashapada command his queen to go to Vasishtha? And was this an act of sin on the part of Vasishtha?" The Gandharva said: Under the influence of the curse, Kalmashapada, in anger, went out of his capital, accompanied by his wife. In a solitary part of the woods he saw a brahman and his wife (Angirasi, v. 6908) embracing each other. The couple ran away, but Kalmashupada forcibly seized the brahman. The brahmani asked him to liberate her husband, but he cruelly devoured him. The tears that the woman shed blazed up like fire and consumed everything in that place. The brahmant cursed the rajarshi, saying that he should meet with instant death when cohabiting with his wife, and that his wife should have a son from Vasishtha, whose children he had devoured, and that child should be the propagator of his race. Then she entered the fire. Vasishtha, by his ascetic power, immediately knew all about it. And long after this, when the rajarshi became freed from his curse, he approached his wife Madayanti, not remembering the curse of the brahmant. Hearing, however, the words of his wife, he recollected the curse, and, therefore, he appointed Vasishtha to beget a son on his queen (I, 182).

Some time after he dwelled in a hermitage practising austerities, from which the gods, headed by Indra, prevailed upon him to refrain. Indra gave him a crystal vinuna (chariot) capable of carrying him through the air like a god, and a triumphal (vaijayanti) garland named Indramala, and a bamboo pole to protect the peaceful. After a year the king planted this pole in the ground in order to worship Indra (from that time all kings plant a bamboo pole, and the next day they cover it with golden clothes, etc.). Indra came there in the form of a swan to accept the worship, and blessed the men and kings who would observe this festivity: I, 63, 2335 (Pauraranandanah), 2354, 2355, 2358.—§ 74 (do.): From the country of the Cedis V. ruled the whole world. [Vicitraviryasutotpatti(h)] ("begetting of sons for Vicitravīrya"). § 171 (cf. Bhīshma-Satyavatī-samvāda). Satuavatī related to Bhīshma the birth of Draipāyana (cf. § 77; from the darkness of his skin he is also called Krshna (v. 4236)), who instantly came when Kall (i.e. Satyavatī) thought of him, and promised to raise offspring in the widows of Vicitravirya. As there was no time for them to observe a rigid vow for one full year, he ordered that they should tolerate his ugliness. Satyavati first addressed herself to Kausalya (i.e. Ambika) and fed brahmans, devarshis, and guests (I, 105). Ambikū, seeing Vyūsa, closed her eves in fear; therefore her son, though he was destined to be mighty, etc., and to have 100 sons, had to be blind. (i.e. Dhrtarashtra's) birth, Vyasa approached Ambalika, who became pale with fear; therefore, her son was pale and was named Pandu. Ambālikā refused to receive Pyāsa again and sent him a cadra maid of hers, adorned with her own ornaments; on her he begat Vidura, who was Dharma, born under the curse of Mandavya. Vyasa then disappeared (I, 106).

[Vicitravīryoparama(h)] ("death of Vicitravīrya"). § 167 (cf. Citrāngadopākhyāna). When Vicitravīrya had come of age, Bhīshma went to Vārānasī to the svayamvara of the three daughters of the king of Kāçi, and, in order to marry them to Vicitravīrya, he carried them off with force to Hāstinapura (having defeated the other princes assembled, among these king Çālva, whom he conquered by means of the Vāruņa and the Aindra weapons, but at last he left him with his life to return to his capital). The eldest, Ambā, he lot free before the wedding, as she declared that she, in her heart, had chosen the Saubha king (i.e. Çālva), and had been chosen by him. Ambikā and Ambālikā he bestowed on Vicitravīrya. After seven years Vicitravīrya died of consumption (yakshman) (I, 102).

Viçvāmitra, a rshi, sou of Gādhi. § 5 (Anukram.): I, 1a, 220 bis (in Nārada's enumeration of departed kings).—§ 134 (cf. Çakuntalop.): V. had deprived Vasishtha of his children; though born as a kshatriya he became a brahman through his penances, and created the river Kauçikī for his ablutions; there, his wife, during a famine, was maintained by the rājarshi Malanga, who was living as a hunter; therefore, when the famine was over, V. changed the name of the river into Pārā and performed a sacrifice for Malanga, and Ināra himself, from fear, came there to drink soma. V., in anger, created another world and a series of nakshatras, beginning with Pratigravana (differently BR. sub vocs), and gave protection to Triçanku, who was cursed by his guru; he could burn the three worlds by his splendour, and by a kick cause the earth to quake; he could sever Moru, and hurl it away at any distance; he could go round the earth in a moment, and Yama, Soma, the maharshie, the Sadhyas, the Viçuas, and the Valakhilyas are afraid of his prowess. To him Indra sent the Apearas Monaka, who, assisted by Vavu and Manmatha, disturbed his penances (I, 71). V. begat on Menaka a daughter, whom she abandoned on the banks of the Malini in the valleys of Himavat. V., however, could not protect the earth even with his best exertions. He then heard of a great fear of Rakehaeae, and went out with his army. In the hermitage of Vasishtha his troops caused much mischief; when the brahman Vasishiha came to his hermitage, he became angry and commanded his cow to create many terrible Cabaras, who, encountering the army of V., caused a great carnage, and the troops fled away. V. then set his heart on ascetic austerities, and in this tirtha of the Sarasvati he began to emaciate his own body (description), although the gods repeatedly attempted to interrupt him. [Vicvāmitropākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Vicvāmitra"): § 7216 (Anuçāsanik.). Bhīshma said: King Ajamīdha (of Bharala's race) > king Jahnu (who got Gangā for his daughter) > Sindhudvīpa (virtuous) > R-r Balākāçra > Vallabha > Kuçika > Gādhi, who, being childless and desiring to have a son, repaired to the forest, where the beautiful Satyarati was born to him. Cyarana's son, Reika Bhargara, asked for her hand; but as he was poor, Gadhi required of him as a dower 1,000 white horses having one black ear, which he obtained from Varuna (by thinking of them at Acratirtha, on the bank of the Ganga, not far from Kanyakubja). Reika granted her a boon, that she should have a son; she related this to her mother, who prevailed upon her to obtain a son also for her; having promised them both a son, he told the mother to embrace an acrattha tree and Satyavati an udumbara tree, and each of them to cat a certain caru (sacrificial offering), consecrated with hymns. The mother exchanged both the trees and the carus. Reika had placed the entire brahman-energy in Satyavati's caru and the kshatriya-energy in that of her mother: "therefore, thy mother will give birth to an excellent brahman and thou to a terrible kal atriya." Satyavatī prevaile l upon him, that not her son, but her son's son should be such. Then, by the favour of Reika, she gave birth to Jamadagni, and the wife of Gadhi to the Bruhmarshi (read brahmarshim) Vicramitra, versed in the Vedas (brahmavādinam). Viçrāmitra attained to the state of a brahman, and became the founder of a race of brahmans. Madhucchanda, etc., (B), were all sons of Viçvāmitra (XIII, 4).

[Viçvāvasumokshaṇa ("the liberation of Viçvāvasu")]. § 530 (cf. Rāmopākhyānap.). Jaṭāyu (brother of Sampāti and son of Aruṇa and friend of Duçaratha) attacked Rāraṇa, who cut off his wings. Rāvaṇa entered Lankā (built by Viçvakṛt) with Sītā. Jaṭāyu indicated to Rāma (Kākutstha) and Lakshmaṇa that Rāraṇa had gone towards the south, and then he died. Rāma caused his funeral obsequies to be duly performed. Rāma and Lakshmaṇa killed a Rākshasa named Kahandha, from whose body there came out a celestial person, viz. the Gandharva prince Viçvāvasu, who had been cursed by a brahman; he directed them to Sugrīca (brother of the monkey king Vālin), who dwelled at the luke Pampā, near the mountain Rshyamūka, with his four counsellors; then he disappeared (111, 279).

Vidulāputraçāsana(m) ("Vidulā's instruction of her son"). § 10 (Parvas.): I, 2, 333.—§ 568 (Bhagavady.): The princess Vidula one day rebuked her son Sanjaya, who, being defeated by the king of the Sindhus, was lying dejected. "Without wrath, as thou art, thou canst not be counted as a man . . . It is better to blaze up for a moment than to smoke for a long time . . . He who has not achieved a great feat, forming the subject of men's conversation, only increases the number of meu; he is neither man nor woman . . . It behoves thee not to adopt the idle, wretched, infamous, and miserable profession of mendicancy that is worthy only of a coward . . . He is a man who cherishes wrath and does not forgive . . . (V, 133) . . . The followers of the Sindhu-king are all discontented and waiting for the distress of their master; others will come to thee with their auxiliaries if they behold thee put forth thy prowess . . . While thou wert a child, a brahman said: 'this one, falling into great distress, will again win greatness.' Cambara has said 'there is not a more miserable state than that in which one does not see how to procure his food from day to day'. By slaying Vrtra, Indra became Mahendra ("the great Indra"), and obtained the soma-cup of Mahendra (v. 4562, B.: Mühendram ca graham lebbe), and the lordship of all the worlds . . . Sovereignty is either the door of heaven or amrta . . . In the possession of wealth, rejoice, as before, with the Sauvira-maidens, and be not ruled over by the Saindhara-maidens . . . Hunded down by tradition from time immemorial, the eternal essence of kehatriya-virtues (kshatrahrdayam) has been ordained by Prajapati himself . . . A kshatriya should rather break than yield. He should bow down to brahmans only and to virtue (dharmaya); he should rule over all other orders, destroying all evil-doers" (V. 134). The son complained that the heart of his mother was made of steel, and blumed the kshatriya-practices. Vidulā said that if Sanjaya was about to be stained by infamy and she did not say it to him, her affection for him would be like that of a she-ass for her young. He ought to have recourse to virtue and profit (V, 135) . . . "We have many treasure-houses unknown to thee . . . thou hast also more than one friend." Despair left Sanjaya's heart, though he was not gifted with great intelligence. He roused himself and achieved all that his mother had pointed out. Indeed, this history, named Jaya, should be listened to by everyone desirous of victory, etc. (V, 136).

Vidura, v. Viduratha!.
Viduragamana(m) ("the arrival of Vidura"). § 10
(Parvasangr.): I, 2, 315 ("am parva, i.e. Viduragamanaparvan).—§ 11 (do.): I, 2, 362 ("am, do.).

[Viduragamanaparvan(°va)] ("on the arrival of Vidura", the 14th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Viduragamana). § 241. The news had been reported to all the monarchs that Draupadi had been married to the sons of Pandu, whom they had thought burnt to death. They then set out for their own dominions. Duryodhana became greatly depressed, and, with his brothers, etc., he set out for Mastinapura. Vidura was filled with joy, and related the news to Dhrtarashtra, who first thought that it was Duryodhana who had been selected by Draupadi, but was very glad on hearing that it was the Pandaras. But Duryodhana and Karna tried to stir 1 m up against them (I, 200). Dhrtardshtra said that he was of their opinion, but did not wish to inform Vidura of it; therefore he had applauded the Pandavas in Vidura's presence. Duryodhana suggested several plans for getting the better of the Pandaras (I, 201). Karna said that the plans would not succeed; he recommended to vanquish them by prowess, while their party was vet weak. Dhrtarashtra summoned Bhishma, Drona, and Vidura, and consulted with them (I, 202). Bhīshma recommended to give to the Pandaras one half of the kingdom (1, 203). Drona approved of this, and, moreover, recommended that a messenger should be sent to Drupada with gifts, and say that Dhrtarashtra was very glad of the new alliance with him, and would take the Pandavas to Hastinapura to be installed on the throne .- § 242. Karna spoke contemptuously of Bhishma and Drona, saying that happiness depended on destiny, and not on friends, etc., mentioning the Magadha king Ambuvīca (b) (1, 204) .- § 243. Vidura recommended the suggestion of Bhishma and Drong, and said that the Pandaras were invincible, as they were assisted by Rāma, Janardana, Sātyaki, etc. (1, 205). Vidura was sent by Dhrtarashtra with numerous jewels, etc., to Drupada and the Pandaras (also hrshna was present). Vidura said that Dhrtarashtra was highly pleased with the alliance with Drupada, and asked Drupada to permit the l'andaras, with their mother and wife, to return to their paternal city (I, 206).

[Viduraparinaya(h)] ("the marriage of Vidura"). § 179 (Sambhavap.): Bhishma married king Devaka's daughter, who was by caste a pārasarī, to Vidura, who begat upon her many children as excellent as himself (I, 114).

[Vipulopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode about Vipula"): § 743b (Anuçasunik.). Bhīshma said: There was, in days of yore, a R. Devaçarman; his beautiful wife Ruci fuscinated every one who saw her, both D., G., and Da., and particularly Indra. Devacarman knew very well the disposition of women, as well as Indra's coveting other men's wives. Once, desirous of performing a sacrifice, he summoned his favourite disciple Vipula Bhargara, and asked him, during his absence, to protect Rues against Indra, describing to him the disguises that Indra assumes (a). Vipula, by his Yoga-power, entered the body of Ruci (description) (XIII, 40). Indra came, but Ruci was unable to move or to utter a word in reply; then, influenced by Vipula, she answered in Sanskrit (? rant samskārabhūshaņā) words that she did not intend to utter. Indra became perplexed, and when he with his spiritual eye discovered Vipula within Ruci, he became afraid that he might curse him. Vipula left the body of Ruci and returned to his own body which was lying near, and rebuked Indra, mentioning Gautama's curse, owing to which Indra's body became disfigured with 1,000 sex-marks, which, owing to Gautama's compassion, were afterwards changed into ever, "see that thou dost not, with thy sons and counsellors, meet with destruction." Cakra, overwhelmed with shame, made himself invisible. A moment after, Devagarman came back, and granted Vipula the boon that he should never swerve away from righteousness; dismissed by his preceptor, Vipula left his abode and practised the most severe austerities. * Devacarman also, with his spouse, began to live in the woods, perfectly fearless of Indra (XIII, 41). Vipula became full of pride. After some time the occasion came for a ceremony of gifts, with respect to the sister of Ruci ~ the Anga-king Citraratha. Meanwhile, a celestial damsel dropped some flowers down to the earth; they were picked up by Ruei, who, adorned with them, went to the pulace of the Angaking. Her sister, Prabharati, the Anga-queen, urged her to obtain some for her, and Ruci informed her husband, who, summoning Vipula, commanded him to bring him some flowers of the same kind. Vipula found some such flowers still lying scattered, quite fresh, and set out for Campa; on his way he saw a human couple moving in a circle, hand in hand; a dispute arose between them, and at lust, each of them took the oath "that one of us who speaks falsely shall, in the next world, meet with the end which will be Vipula's". Vipula became very sad; proceeding a little way he beheld six other men playing with dice made of gold and silver; they were heard by Vipula to take the same oath as the first couple. At last he recollected the manuer in which he had acted in protecting his preceptor's wife (placing limb within limb, face within face), without telling his preceptor the truth. Coming to Campā, he gave the flowers to his preceptor (XIII, 42). Devaçarman, too, knew what he had seen on his way, and how he had acted in protecting Ruoi: he explained that the first couple were Day and Night, the others the six Seasons. He absolved Vipula and ascended to heaven with his wife and his disciple. Markandeys had narrated this tale to Bhishma on the banks of the Ganga (XIII, 43).

[Vitahavyopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to VItahavya"). § 736b (Anuçasanik.). Bhīshma said: While Manu, in days of yore, was righteously ruling his subjects, he obtained a righteous son Caryati, in whose race were born Vatea's sons, the kings Haihaya and Talajangha. Haihaya (or Vitahavya) had 10 wives and 100 heroic sons, who all studied the Vedas and Dhanurveda. In Kaçi was king Haryaçva, the grandfather of Divodasa. The sons of king Haihaya (Vitahavya-dayadaih) invaded Kūçi and slew king Haryaçva in a battle between the Ganga and the Yamuna. and then went back to their own delightful city in the Vatsacountry. Meanwhile Haryaqva's son Sudeva was installed as Kūçi-king. The 100 sons of Vitahavya once more came and defeated him in battle, and then returned to their own city. After this, Sudera's son Divodasa became installed as Kāciking; at the command of Indra he built the city of Varanasi between the Ganga and the southern bank of the Gomati. The Haihayas aguin attacked Divodusa; he fought for 1,000 days, lost his army, left his capital, and fled away to the retreat of Bharadvaja, who was his priest, and performed a sacrifice, in consequence of which Pratardana was born to him. On the same day when Pratardana was born, he grew as great as a boy of 13 years, and mastered the Vodas and Dhanurreda, Bharadvaja (aided by Yoga) having entered into the prince and caused all the energy of the universe to enter his body (he was praised by bards and D-r., etc.; description). Divodusa installed Pratardana as yuvaraja and ordered him to murch against the sons of Vitahavya. Pratardana speedily crossed the Ganga and proceeded against the city of the Vitahavyas and slew them all. King Vitahavya field away to the retreat of Bhrgu. Pratardana followed in his footsteps and ordered Bhrgu to surrender king Vitahavya. Bhrgu said: "there is no kehatriya in this retreat; they who are here are all brahmans." Pratardana returned home. and Vitahavya became a Br-r. in consequence of Bhrgu's statement. [Vrihidraunikaparvan(ova)] ("on the drong of rice", the 45th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). § 519. Dwelling in the woods, the Pandavas spent eleven years in a miserable plight, Yudhishthira repenting of his act of gambling, and the others thinking of revenge. Once Vyāsa came to them and spoke to Yudhishthira about the meritoriousness of asceticism, raying that a wise man, knowing that life has its ups and downs, is neither filled with joy nor with grief. while foolish persons are reborn as beasts in after life; nothing in this world is more difficult to practise than charity, and therefore charity is superior to everything; even a small gift may be of great result in future life, provided that what is given away is properly acquired and, with a pure mind and in due time, bestowed on pious persons; but the bestowal of ill-gotten gains can never rescue the giver from evil (111, 259).- § 520: Mudgala (q.v.).

She worshipped the Pitre and the gods with fasts and practised penances in that solitary forest not wishing to marry, as she did not see a husband worthy of her. When she could no longer move, she set her heart upon departing for the other world. Narada told her that she had no regions of blessedness to obtain, not having cleansed herself by the rite of marriage. She then went to a concourse of rehis, and said that she would give half her penances to him who would accept her hand in marriage. Galara's son, the rshi Prakerngavat, accepted her hand on condition that he should live with her only one night. On that night she became a young lady of the finest complexion. etc., and Galara's son became very happy. At morn she said: "he that will, with rapt attention, pass one night in this tirtha after having gratified the gods with oblations of water, shall obtain the merit of the vow of brahmacarya for 58 years," and then she departed for heaven. He soon followed her, moved by sorrow: IX, 52, 3003.

Vrtraçatru, Vrtrahan, Vrtrahantr, Vrtranisūdana = Indra, q.v.

[Vrtra-vadha(h)] ("the killing of Vrtra"): § 693b (Mokshadh.). Bhishma said: In days of yore, Indra, accompanied by the celestial forces, proceeded in his chariot, and beheld As. Vrtra, stationed before him like a mountain, 500 yojanas in height and 300 in circumference. Indra was struck with palsy in the lower extremities. On the eve of that great battle between D. and As. there arose loud shouts from both sides, etc. Vrtra felt neither awe nor fear. Then the encounter commenced; the entire welkin was enveloped by the combatants of both sides; all the gods with Brahmán, and R., Si., G., and Aps. on their chariots had assembled in order to see the battle. Frira shot rocks, the gods arrows; Vrtra employed illusion; Indra was stupefied; Vasishtha restored him to his senses by the Rathantara, pointing out to him Brahmon, etc. (a). Indra, by yoga, dispelled the illusions of Vrtra. Brhaspati (the son of Angiras) and R. repaired to Civa, whose energy became a fever and penetrated Vrtra; Vishau entered the thunderbolt of Indra; Brhaspati. Vasishtha, and R. urged Indra to slay Vrtra, and so did Civa, saying that Vrtra was the soul of the universe, capable of going everywhere; for 60,000 years Trira had practised penances in order to obtain strength; Brahman had given him the boons he had solicited: the greatness of yogins, large powers of illusions, excess of might, etc.; Cira told Indra to slay him with yoga, and imparted to him his own energy. D, and R. uttered loud cheers, etc. Suddenly all As. were afflicted with the loss of memory; in a trice their powers of illusion also disappeared. R. and D. praised Cakra and Cira (XII, 282). Description of the symptoms that appeared on the body of Vrtra when he was overtaken by that fever: His memory issued out of his mouth in form of a dreadful jackal. Inauspicious omens. Indra looked hard at him; Vrtra yawned and attered superhuman cries; while Vrtra was yawning Indra hurled his thunderbolt at him and slew him; [XII, 287, 58 ff. = 10,267 ff.: the thunderbolt cut Vrtra into two halves; Vrtra then came to the highest region of Vishnu, for it was by his devotion to Vishnu that he had overwhelmed the universe]; then Indra entered heaven with that thunderbolt pervaded by Vishnu. Then Brahmavadhya (description) issued out of the body of the slain Vrte a.

A little while after, when Indra was proceeding towards heaven, she seized him and stuck to him. Indra entered the fibres of a lotus stalk and dwelt there for many years. But Brahmaradhya pursued him closely, and deprived him of all his energy. At last he repaired to Brahman, who made her leave Indra by apportioning one quarter to Agni (whence it should enter him who did not offer oblations of seed, etc. to Agni); one quarter to the trees, herbs, and all kinds of grass (whence it should possess the men who would cut or tear any of them at parvan-days); one quarter to the Apsarasse (whence it should possess that man who would cohabit with women during their courses); and one quarter to the waters (whence it should possess that man who would cast into the waters phlegm and urine and excrements). With Brahmán's permission Indra then performed a horse-eacrifice and thereby became cleansed, regained his prosperity, and slew thousands of foes. From the blood of Vrtra were born the cikhandan (the crests of cocks (?) or name of a plant. BR.), which, for this reason, must not be eaten by the twiceborn classes, etc. Blessing upon the recitor (XII, 283).

Yāja, a Brahmarshi, brother of Upayāja. § 218b (Draupadīsambhava): Drupada saw the two brothers of Kacyapa's race, Y. and Upayaja. He courted Upayaja and asked him to perform a sacrifice, by which he might obtain a son who might slay Drong, and promised him an arbude of kine. But Unaydia refused. Drupada once more began to pay homage to him, and after a year Upayaja said that his elder brother, Y., once had taken up a fruit without inquiring of the purity of the spot, and had, in the house of his preceptor, used to eat the remains of other people's feasts; he would entertain no scruples. Describing the might of Drona (" Drona is also skilled in the Brahmastra, his bow is six aratus long") Drupada promised Y. to give him eight ayutas (cf. 7. 6385: "an arbuda") of kine. Y. consented and prevailed upon Upayaja to assist him. [Yakshayuddhaparvan(°va)] ("the combat with the Yukshus", the 38th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Yakshayuddha). § 436. The Pandavas, etc., returned to the hermitage of Narayana. Once Yudhishthira said to them: "We have passed these four years in the woods; it has been appointed by Arjuna, that after the fifth year he will come to the mountain Cveta." They then set out with the bruhmans and the Rakshasas, and protected by Lomaça, sometimes going on foot, sometimes carried by the Rakshasas, towards the north, beholding on the way the mountains Mainaka, Gandhamadana, and Çveta, and on the seventeenth day they reached the slopes of Himarat, not far from Gandhamadana, and were received by R.-r. Vrehaparean in his hermitage, where they passed seven nights. On the eighth day they entrusted their remaining robes, their sacrificial vessels, ornaments, and jewels to Vrshaparran, and, following his instructions, set out for the north, on foot, with Dhaumya, Kṛshṇā, and Lomaça. On the fourth day they reached Creta, and entered Gandhamadana (b) with Draupadi and the brahmans, and saw the great Ganga (e). Thereafter, they went to the hermitage of Arshiehena (III. 158). Arshtishena received the four Pandavas and Krshna and Dhaumya, and said that during the parvan days rehis living upon water and air and moving through the sky come to this mountain, sounds of kettledrums, etc., being heard on the summits, and that they should not attempt to proceed further, but wait for Arjuna there, as they could not go beyond Kailasa (d) (III. 159).—§ 437. They passed the fifth year in the hermitage of Arshfishena, eating flesh of deer killed with unpoisoned shafts, listening to the stories told by Lomaça. Ghafotkaca had departed, promising to be present when occasion arose. Munis and Caranas visited them. One day Suparna carried off a mighty Naga from the lake, while the mountain trembled, etc., and the wind, raised by Suparna's wings, brought celestial flowers of five colours before the Pandavas towards the river Acvaratha. Krshna expressed to Bhima the wish of seeing the top of the mountain when he had driven away the Rakshaeas. Bhima set out with bow, sword, and mace, and having ascended the summit, thereby gladdening Kinnaras, Nagas, Munis, Gandharvas, and Rakshasas, he blew his shell. Yakshas and Rakshasas (Krodhavaçah, v. 11757) assailed him with maces, clubs, etc., but were killed or defeated, and the surviving fled towards the south, forsaking their weapons. The Rakshasa Manimat, the friend of Kubera, in vain attempted to recall them, and with clubs, javelins, etc., he rushed at Bhima and pierced his right arm with an iron spear with a golden haft, but at last was killed by Bhima with his mace. The surviving Rakshasas went towards the east (III, 160). - § 438. Hearing various sounds and not seeing Bhima, the Pundavas and Krshnd, and Dhaumya and the brahmans were filled with anxiety, and, entrusting Draupadi to the charge of Archtishena, they ascended the summit of the mountain and embraced Bhima, who was censured and again warned by Yudhishthira. Kubera, on hearing about the matter from the Rakshasas, in anger let yoke his carriage, and, eulogized by the gods and Gandharvas, and surrounded by 1,000 Yakshas, he set out through the firmament to Gandhamadana, where he seated himself on his seat Pushpaka (b), surrounded by Yakshas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas, and Apsarases, with his noose and sword and bow, and asked Yudhishthira not to be angry with Bhima as Bhima had only been the instrument of destiny, and said to Bhima that he did not mind his act of rashness as he had thereby been delivered from the curse of Agastya (c) (III, 161). Kubera then gave Yudhishthira some wise counsel, referring to the Krta-yuga (d); he said, that Yudhishthira ought to check the rashness of Bhimasena; they should return to the hermitage of the R.-r Archiehena and reside there during the first dark fortnight; the inhabitants of Alaka with Gandharras, and Yakshas with Kinnaras, etc., should, at the command of Kubera, protect them, and his servants procure for them meat and drink; he praised Arjuna (e). Arjuna would soon join them. Then Kubera went to the mountain Asta, followed by thousands of Yakshas and Rakshasas in vehicles drawn by horses flying in the air. The dead bodies of the Rakshasas were, at the command of Kubera, removed. The Pandaras dwelt several nights there, being honoured by the Rakehasas (III, 162).-§ 439. At sunrise, Dhaumya and Archtichena came to them, and Dhaumya, seizing Yudhishthira's hands, pointed out, towards the east, the Mandara mountain, the east being the region of Indra and Vaicravana, as the South is that of Yama with his abode Samyamana, and the Asta mountain, where the sun sets in the west, that of Varuna, together with the ocean; in the north Meru, with the dwelling of Brahman, where Prajapati creates all creatures, and the seven mindborn sons of Brahman (of whom Daksha was the seventh), and where the seven Devarshis (i.e. Saptarshayah), with Vasishtha at their head, rise and set; next, to the east of Meru, the abode of Narayana or Vishnu, that cannot be seen. by gods or Danavas, and where even Brahmarshis have no access, not to speak of Maharshis, but only Yatis; thence, they do not return to this world; Vishnu alone shines there. Description of the revolving around Meru of the sun, moon, and stars ("having coursed round Moru, the moon again repairs to Mandara", v. ii, 873) (III, 163).- § 440. The Pandavas dwelled there for a month, visited by Gandharras and Makarshis. A night and a day became to them like a year, for since the departure of Arjuna, they had not felt joy. After having dwelt for five years in the abode of Indra Yanasandhi ("negotiation for peace by embassy"?). § 10 (Parvasengr.): I, 2, 331 (parra, i.e. Yanasandhiparvan).

[Yānasandhiparvan(°va)] ("section relating to the Yanasandhi", q.v.), the 60th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr. § 561. After the night had passed away, all the princes and chiefs, Bhishma, etc. (a) entered the court-hall (description) to hear the message of Sanjaya (adorned with ear-rings), who had come back from the Pandagas by the aid of Saindhara steeds. Sanjaya related the salutations of the Pandaras (V. 47). Sanjaya related that Arjuna (! cf. § 556: Sanjayayanap., V, 23-28) had said, with Yudhishthira's sanction. that Sanjaya should say to Duryodhana and Karna, threatening them with Bhimasena, etc. (B), that if the Dhartarashtras desired war, then all the aims of the Pandavas were accomplished, as Duryodhana should lie down on the bare earth, deprived of life, etc. Arjuna (b) trusted himself and Krohna (c); he said that Duryodhana often thought of imprisoning Krehna, and sought to create a sudden disunion between Krshna and Arjuna. "There are with us many aged brahmans, versed in various sciences . . . who are prophesying the great destruction of the Kurus and the Srajayas, and the ultimate victory of the Pandaras . . . thy bow Gandira yawns without being handled, etc.; on the top of my flagstaff are heard terrific voices (' when shall thy car be voked. O Kirīţin?'); innumerable jackals howl at night. and Rakshasas frequently alight from the sky . . . I will use the Sthanakarna, Paçupala, and Brahma weapons, and all those that Cakra gave me." [This speech of Arjuna is not found in § 556 : Sanjayayanap.] (V, 48). Bhishma suid to Duryodhana that Nara and Narayana (Nara-Narayanau) (d) were Arjuna and Krehna: it was with their aid that Cakra vanquished the Daityas and Danavas; Nara slew hundreds and thousands of Paulomas and Kalakanjas in battle; Arjuna, with an arrow, severed the head of the Asura Jambha while the latter was about to swallow him; he afflicted Hiranyapura on the other side of the ocean, having vanquished in battle 60,000 of Nivatakaracas; and in the same way also Narayana has, in this world, destroyed numberless other Dailyas and Danavas. Karna boasted that he would slay all the Pandavas in battle, but was rebuked by Bhishms, saying that Karns had seen his own brother slain by Anjuna in the city of Virata, and alluding to the contents of the Goharana-, and the Ghoshayatraparvan. Drong also counselled peace, but got no answer from Dhylardshira (V. 48). At the request of Dhriardshira, Saujaya related that the Pencellas, etc. (7) looked up to Yudhishthira. As he was questioned about Dhrehfadyumna and the Somakas, he first fell down in a swoon. Then, regarding Bhimasena (e) he mentioned the lac-house, etc. (8); regarding Arjuna, the burning of the Khandaya forest, etc. (e); then Nakula (f) and Sahadera (g); Cikhandin (ζ); the five Kekaya princes, etc. (7) (V, 50). Dhrtarashtra was most afzaid of Bhime (who was taller than Arjuns by the span of the thumb), with his mace (full four cubits in length, with six sides), mentioning his killing Jarquendha (V, 51). Dhrtardehtra was also afraid of Arjuna, who he feared would conquer Karna (being compassionate and heedless), and Drons (being aged and having affection for his pupil Arjuna); "thirtythree years have passed since the burning of the Khandava forest; we have never heard of his being defeated anywhere " [but cf. the reading of B. trayastrm; at samahuya, i.e. challenging the thirty-three gods (V, 52). Dhrtardshire was afraid of the allies of Yudhishthira: the Pañoalas, Kekayas, etc.  $(\theta)$  (V, 53). Sanjaya rebuked Dhṛtarāshṭra for his behaviour towards the Pandavas; "the Mategas, etc. (1) all decline to pay thee homage now" (V, 54). Duryodhana said, that when the Pandavas had been exiled, there came to them Krshna, etc. (x), all assembled in a place not far from Indraprastha, and suggested to Yudhishthira that he should take back the kingdom; "the people of the realm were all annoyed with us, and all our friends also were angry with us"; but Bhishma, Krpa, and Acratthaman had despised the foes ("inflamed with anger at the death of his father this Bhishma, in days of old, had conquered all the kings of the earth, in a single chariot"). "Now the Pandavas are without allies; and all these kings can, for my sake, enter the fire or the sea . . . Having given up all hopes of a town, Yudhishthirs craves only five villages . . . There is none on earth equal to me in an encounter with the mace. In battle, I am Sankarshana's equal; I will certainly slay Bhima, Bhishma, etc. ( $\lambda$ ), every one of these is singly capable of slaying the Pandaras." He alluded to the superhuman circumstances concerning Bhishma, etc. (µ), to the resolution of the Samçaptakas to slay Arjuna or be slain by him; "our chief warriors are Bhishma, etc. (v); they have seven akshauhinis, we have eleven; Brhaspati hus said, that an army which is less by one-third ought to be encountered" (V, 55). At the request of Duryodhana, Sanjaya described the chariots of Arjuna (h), Yudhishfhira (i), Bhimasona (j), Sahadepa (k), Nakula (l); "and excellent steeds, presented by the celestials, carry the sons of Subhadra and Drawpadi" (V, 56). At the request of Dhytardehtra, Sanjaya mentioned the allies of the Pandavas, Krehna, etc. (f), and who had been assigned to each of them as his share: Cikhandin & Bhishma; Yudhishthira & the Madra king; Bhimasena & Duryodhana's sons and 100 brothers, the rulers of the east and the south; Arjuna & Karna, Jayadratha, etc.; the five Keknyae & the Kekayas, Malavas, Çalvakas, Trigartau Samçaptakau; Abhimanyu & Duryodhana's sons (?), Duhçasana's sons, king Brhadbala; Draupadeyāḥ + Dhrehfadyumna & Drona: Cekitāna & Somadatta; Sātyaki & Krlavarman; Sahadeva & Cakuni; Nakula & Ulūka, Sūraevalāķ. All the other kings had been distributed in their respective shares. Thus the Pandars host had been distributed into divisions. Virate with all his Mateya warriors would support Cikhandin. Dhriardshira was exceedingly afraid of Yudhishihira, etc. (0). Duryodhana said that Bhishma, etc. (x) were invincible. Dhytarashtra maintained that Bhishma did not wish a battle.

771 Yashtr-Yātudhāna.

Sanjaya said that Dhrshtadyumne was always urging the l'undavas to fight, and professed that he would alone encounter all the assembled kings: Bhishma, etc. (p), and his words were approved by Yudhishthira; Dhrshtadyumna hud told Sanjaya to say to the Kurus, etc. (s), that they ought not to suffer themselves to be slain by Arjuna, who was protected by the celestials; they should send a good man to Yudhishifting and entreat him to accept the kingdom. This is not found in Sanjayayanap., § 556] (V, 57). Dhrtarashtra mentioned that Yudhishthira led the brahmacarya mode of life from his very youth, and saying that he himself, etc.  $(\tau)$  did not applaud war, he urged Duryodhana to desist from hostilities and give back to the Pandavas their kingdom, saying, that it was Karna, Duhçusana, and Cakuni who led Duryodhana astray. Duryodhana answered that, without depending upon Dhrtarashtra, etc. (v), he and Karna and Duhçusana would perform, in honour of Yama, a sacrifice in battle and slay the Pandaras; he said that he would sacrifice his life rather than surrender to the Pandavas even that much of land which may be covered by the sharp point of a needle. Dhrtarashtra said that he abandoned Duryodhana for ever, and grieved for the kings who would be crushed by Yuyudhana, etc. ( $\phi$ ) ( $\nabla$ , 58). At the request of Dhrtaeashtra, Sanjaya related how he had entered the inner apartments (description) in order to inform Arjuna and Krahna; he had seen two straight lines on Arjuna's foot-soles. Krshna had threatened the Kurus, mentioning that Krehna had invoked him with tears, and that D., As., men. Y., G., and N. were incapable of encountering Arjuna in battle, and alluding to his exploits in the city of Virage (v. Goharanap.) (V, 59). Dhrtarashtra represented to Duryodhana that Agni would help Arjuna, remembering what was done to him at Khandara, that Dharma, etc., would help the Pandaras from parental affection, that Arjuha-took up 500 arrows at a time, that Bhīshma, etc.  $(\chi)$  regarded him as invincible, and said he desired peace (V, 60). Duryodhana, inflamed with wrath, said that according to Vydea, Narada, and Paracu-Rama, the gods never engaged in work; if Agni, Vayu, Dharma, Indra, or the Acrins had ever engaged in work, the Parthas could never have fullen into distress, and they and the Marute would not venture to protect his foes; "charmed by me, Agni will be instantly extinguished . . . , my energy is greater than that of the gods; . . . it is I who set agoing all the affairs of both gods and Asuras . . . ; neither D. nor G., nor As. nor Ra. are capable of saving him who has incurred my displeasure . . . ; thou wilt hear of the defeat of the Pandavas, etc.  $(\psi)$ ; . . . whatever knowledge of weapons there is in Bhishma, etc. ( $\omega$ ), exists in me as well " (V, 61). Karns said to Duryodhana, mentioning the curse of Paraçu-Rama, when he, by a lie, obtained the Brahma weapon from him, that he would slay the Pañcalas, etc. (aa). Bhishma mentioned the Khandava forest, and said that the dart which Karna had got from Indra, would be reduced to ashes by Krehna with his discus, and that his other shaft (having a head like a serpent), which he respectfully worshipped with flowery garlands, would be destroyed by Arjuna because he was protected by Krehna. Karna made the pledge not to fight before Bhishma's fall, and went to his own abode. Bhishms ridiculed Karns's boasting before the kings of Avanti, etc.  $(\beta\beta)$  (V, 62). Duryodhana boasted; Vidura praised self-restraint (V, 63). Vidura related that once two birds had flown away with the net in which they were caught, but were again caught when they began to quarrel.

"So it is also with kinsmen. Once we, with some hunters and brahmans conversant with magic and charms, repaired to the northern mountain Gandhamadana, with excellent medicinal herbs, and inhabited by Si. and G. There was, on a precipice, some honey, Kubera's fuvourite drink, guarded by poisonous snakes; the brahmans said that a mortal drinking of it would win immortality, a sightless man obtain sight, and an old man would become a youth. The hunters desired to obtain it, and all perished. So it is with Duryodhana. In a single chariot Arjuna conquered the whole earth: Bhishma and Drona, etc. were routed by him at the city of Viraja. Remember also Drupada and the king of the Mateyas" (V, 64). Dhrtardehfra warned Duryodhana against the Pandavas, etc.  $(\gamma \gamma)$ , and recommended him to follow Bhishma, etc. (88) as his guides, mentioning the combat at the city of Virata (V. 65). At the request of Dhrtarashtra. Sanjaya related that Arjuna had said that Bhishma, etc. (ee) were all on the eve of death, if they did not give up to Yudhishthira his own share of the kingdom (V. 66). As Duryodhana showed little regard for the words of Sanjaya, and the rest remained silent, the assembled kings rose and retired. Dhrtarashtra, who always followed the counsels of his son, began to inquire in secret of Sanjaya about the resolves of his own party and of the foes. Sanjaya caused him to let Vidura introduce Vydea and Gandhari (V, 67). Sarjaya extolled Krshna (m), and mentioned some of those whom he had vanquished (\( \zeta \zeta \) (V, 68). Discourse between Dhytarachtra and Sanjaya on the attributes of Kychna. Dhrtaraehtra told Duryodhana to seek refuge with Krehna. Duryodhana refused. Dhytarashtra complained of him to Gandhari. Gandhari threatened Duryodhana with Bhimasona. Vyūsa recommended to Dhytardshtra to seek salvation through Krshna. Requested by Dhrtarashtra, Sanjaya explained the path of salvation through Krehna (V, 69). At the request of Dhrtarushtra, Sanjaya enumerated some names of Krehna (V, 70). Dhrtarāshira complained that he could not see Krehna, whom he extolled under several names (17) (V, 71).

[Yavakrītopākhyana(m)] ("the episode relating to Yavakrita"). § 414 (Tirthay.). The learned Raibhya and the Rshi Bharadvaja were friends. Raibhya had two learned sons, Arvavasu and Paravasu; Bharadvaja only one son, Yavakrita. As Yavakrita saw that Raibhya and his sons were estoemed by the brahmans, while Bharadvaja was alighted, he practised austerities (exposing himself to a blazing fire) in order to acquire Vedic knowledge for himself and his father (cf. v. 10817) instead of acquiring it from a teacher during a long time. Indra was alarmed, and twice he in vain attempted to make Yavakrīta desist from his penances, saying that they never could be successful. As Yavakrita declared that he would cut off his limbs and sacrifice them in the fire, Indra assumed the guise of an old decrepit brahman, and began to throw up a dam of sand at that spot of the Bhagirathi where Yavakrita used to bathe, and declared that Yavakrita's intentions were equally impossible. Then Yavakrita desisted from his plan, and Indra granted him that the Vedas should be revealed to him and his father, and that he should excel other men. Bharadvaja said that Yavakrīta would become proud and uncharitable and thence destruction would soon overtake him (§ 415), and told him some gathas, narrated by the gods, about Medhavin (q.v.).—§ 416. Bharadvaja mude Yavakrīta promise to shun the irritable Raibhya and his sons, and Yavakrita began to offend other rehis (III, 135). Once, in the month of Madhava, he came to the hermitage of Raibhya and seduced (?) (of. sajjayam asa, var. lect. Nil., instead of majjayam asa) the wife of Paravasu. When Raibhya came home and saw what had happened, he offered in the fire two matted locks of his hair, whence sprang out a woman resembling his daughterin-law, who robbed Yapakrita of his water-pot, and a Rakshus, who flew at him with his uplifted spear, as he had been deprived of his water-pot and rendered unclean (ucchishta). Yavakrita fled to a tank and then to all the rivers, and, finding them all devoid of water, he attempted to enter into the agnihotra room of his father, but was stopped at the door by a blind çudra warder, and killed by the rakshas. The Rakshas, with the permission of Raibhya, began to live with the female (III, 136). When Bharadvaja returned home, the sacrificial fires, which used to welcome him every day, did not come forward to welcome him. Having heard from the cudra what had happened, he cursed Raibhya, saying that he should be killed by his eldest son. He cremated Yavakrita, and then himself entered the fire (III, 137). At that time king Brhaddyumna, the yajya of Raibhya, employed Arvavasu and Paravasu at a sacrifice, while Raibhya stayed at home with the wife of Paravasu. One day Pararasu, returning home to see his wife, met in the darkness his father in the wood wrapped in the skin of a black antelope, and, mistaking him for a deer, killed him. Then, after having performed the funeral rites of his father, he prevailed upon Areavasu to observe the vow prescribed in the case of killing a brahman, while he himself conducted When Arravasu came back, having the sacrifice alone. observed the vow, Paravasu caused him to be driven away from the sacrifice as a slayer of a brahman. The brahmarshi Arravasu went to the wood, and, applying to the Sun, he practised austerities and mastered the Rahasyaveda of the Sun. The Sun appeared to him in his embodied form, and said the gods were pleased by him. They elected Arvarasu and rejected Paravasu. The gods Agni, etc., granted him the boon that Raibhya, Bharadvaja, and Yavakrita revived, that Paravasu was absolved from his sin, that Raibhya did not recollect his having been slain, and that the Saura Veda should attain celebrity (pratishtham). The gods explained to Yavakrīta that Raibhya had been able to kill him because he had acquired his knowledge with great exertion and in the course of a long time, while Yavakrīta had learnt the Vedas without exertion and without a guru. Then Indra and the gods returned to heaven (III, 138).

He then recited some verses (vv. 3174-3177) and took back from his son his own decrepitude, giving him back his youth. He then installed Paru on the throne, saying that he was his true heir, and should continue the lineage which should be named after him. Y, then retired to Bhrgutunga, and having spent a long time in ascetism, observing the vow of fasting, he died and ascended to heaven with his wives (I, 75): I, 75, 3164, 3171, 3172.- § 145 (Kaca): I, 76, 3183 (daçamo yaḥ Prajāpateḥ), 3185, 3186 (Devayānyāç ca saṃyogaṃ Your Nahushasya ca).- § 146 (Devayani): I, 78, 3292 (Nahushātmajah), 3301; 81, (3366), (3369), (3372), 3372, (3374), (3376), (3378), (3381), (3383), 3387, (3390), 3394 (Y. married Devayani and promised not to cohabit with Carmishtha).- § 147 (do.): I, 82, 3397, (3410), (3414), (3416) (Carmishtha prevailed upon Y. to beget sons on her); 83, 3432 (the sons of Y. were the foll.: with Devayaui Yadu and Turvasu, with Carmiehtha Druhyu, Anu and Pūru), 3434, 3450, 3452, (3455), 3460 (Nāhushaḥ), (3461), (3463) (Uçanas cursed Y. to be overcome with decrepitude, etc.).-§ 148 (cf. the Marula, and the Tasus, wandering about in Devaloka and Brahmaloka. One day Indra asked him what he had said to Puru when he bestowed the kingdom upon him. Y. answered that he had said: "The whole country between the Ganga and the Yamund is thine, this is the central region of the earth, the outlying regions will be the dominions of thy brothers. Those without anger are ever superior to those under its sway, etc." (I, 87). As Y. said that he did not know his equal in ascetic austerities among men, gods, Gandharras, and maharshis, Indra declared that, owing to this haughtiness, he should fall from heaven, yet he should fall among the When falling, he was beheld by the rajarshi Ashfaka (I, 88), of whom he was the maternal grandfuther; Y. spoke disapprovingly of haughtiness, etc., and told that, leaving earth, he had obtained many high regions for 1,000 years, then he had dwelt in the town of Indra (having 1,000 gates and extending 1,000 yojanas all around) for 1,000 years, then for 1,000 years in the world of Prajapati, then in the abode of Devadeva (i.e. Vishnu); he had also dwelt in Nandana for 100 ayutas of years, assuming any form at will, sporting with the Apsarases; then there had come a messenger of the gods with a grim visage, who thrice had shouted to him "fall"; then he had fallen from Nandana, hearing, while falling, the compassionate exclamations of the gods, who had directed him to full to the sacrificial place of Ashiaka and his companions (I, 89). Y. continued: Those who speak of their own merits after having dwelt for 60,000 or 80,000 years in heaven, are doomed to suffer the pains of the hell called bhauma (i.e. existence on the earth), and are attacked by certain Rakshasas with sharp teeth. Y. then taught the lore of transmigration and emancipation (I, 90). Y. explained the duties of grhasthas, bhikshus, brahmacarins, and vanapraethas, and the different kinds of munis and mauna (vows of silence) (I, 91). Y. then said: "I now shall fall into the bhauma hell, the Lokapas of Brahmán hasten me thither." The kings Ashtaka, Pratardana (I, 92), Vasumanas Aushadaçvi, and Cibi Auçinara, offered him their "lokas" and volunteered to go to hell (naraka) in his place; Y. did not accept the offer. Then appeared five golden chariots, in which they all five ascended to heaven, Cibi leaving the others behind him. Y. told them that he was their maternal grandfather, that he had given the whole earth with her horses, etc., to brahmans, and that the earth and the firmament and fire existed owing to his truth. *(I, 93): I, 86, 3535 (Nahusho raja), 3541, 3543, 3544 (Nahushah); 87, 3553, (3555); 88, †3564, (3565), (†3567), †3568, †3569; 89. Y, uttered the wish that he might fall among the righteous. He fell down among his daughter's sons Pratardana, Vasumanas, Cibi, and Ashtaka, in the Naimisha wood, where they performed a vajapeya sacrifice. They gave him their merits (punya, dharma, etc.), and the result of all their sacrifices. Madhavi also came and gave him the moiety of hers, likewise Galava, who gave him the eighth part of his (V, 121). As soon as Y. was recognized by those virtuous persons, he rose again to heaven without touching the surface of the earth, and his four daughter's sons, in a loud voice, repeated the gift of their merits (Ashtaka had performed hundreds of pundarika, gosava, and vajapeya sacrifices, Çibi had never spoken a falsehood) (V, 122). Y. was honoured in heaven by G., Aps., D.-r,-R.-r, and the gods. Brahmán explained to him that it was his vanity alone that had been able to destroy all his merit (cf. also § 149). # POSTSCRIPTUM.

The author of this work, the late Professor S. Sörensen (*23rd November, 1849—18th December, 1902), was an eminent Sanskrit scholar. While an undergraduate he strenuously applied himself to the study of Classical Philology and Sanskrit at the University of Copenhagen, where he became a pupil of J. N. Madvig and N. L. Westergaard. In 1883 he took the degree of doctor of philosophy with a most valuable and comprehensive dissertation on the "Mahābhārata and its Place in Indian Literature", in which he made an attempt at determining the oldest elements of that great epic. Unfortunately he only obtained the professorship of Indian Philology in the Copenhagen University at an advanced age. In 1902, a short time before his premature death, he succeeded V. Fausböll in the only chair of Indian Philology in the Copenhagen University.

He began to collect the materials for the present work as long ago as about the year 1880, and continued it under great difficulties and self-sacrifice. In the year 1902 the work was so far advanced that he could commence printing, but only the first four sheets (pages 1-32) had been put into type before his death. The manuscript of the preface, the concordance, and pages 33-153 had been put into final shape by him, whilst the materials for the rest of the work were left unrevised. In these circumstances it was resolved that the work should be continued, and the revision and final preparation of the manuscript was, under the superintendence of the undersigned D. Andersen, committed to the undersigned E. Olesen, who had already assisted the author for two years.

During the further revision, however, it was found that the collection of the material had partly been provisional, and some time had to be spent in completing it. Furthermore, it was considered advisable to add a selection of the various readings from the Bombay Edition. This accounts for the rather numerous Additions and Corrections. Several other difficulties arose during the preparation and printing of the work, especially in the time of the Great War, but they were all overcome and now we are amply rewarded for all our efforts in being able to place the great work of our compatriot before the learned world.

Our sincere thanks are due to Professor Sten Konow and to Sir George A. Grierson, who both of them have read all the proofs and given us many valuable hints. Also the printers deserve our best thanks for their accurate and skilful work. No less thanks are due to the publishers, who have been ready to carry out this far from lucrative undertaking.

Finally, we acknowledge with the deepest gratitude the subventions which have been granted by The Danish Government, The Carlsberg Fund, The Rask-Oersted Fund, and the India Office, which gracefully granted its support to the undertaking in subscribing to a number of copies.
